Mr. President, men have shown wonderful skill in cheating the Indians, but I protest that this Senate ought not to be a party to these frauds; it ought not to make legal a contract for the Indians which did not before exist; it ought not to suspend the operation of laws which were enacted for their protection. I insist, therefore, that after the words "thirty-one cents," on page 70, in line 11, all of this amendment should be stricken out to the word "actions," in line 6, on page 71.

The Court of Claims has jurisdiction given to it by this proposed statute. The court is authorized—

To hear and determine said claims and award judgments thereon.

I have no particular complaint, so far as I have observed, against the remainder of the section. Still the bill well deserves criticism; but at present my attention has been called to this effort to give validity to a contract and to abrogate or suspend the operation of two sections of the Revised Statutes, which I think is giving to these claimants against the Indians an advantage to which they are not entitled, and which is not in harmony with justice or right. These men knew the law, and they have already received very large payments.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, there is an entire misconception about this provision. If I were in charge of it, I should allow it to be amended in any way, because these suggestions do not alter it at all. This provision in reference to the suspension of these statutes will not affect the claimants who are spoken of here, these attorneys, as having had some undue advantages. It is intended for the benefit of the Indians who were not in the tribal organization, but were separated from it. It is, therefore, solely in their interest and against the claimants under the contract with Bryan. So all this sympathy is entirely out of place, for the purpose and the intention and the effect of this amendment is to give to the Indians not strictly embraced in the tribal organization, but separated from it, an opportunity of claiming a part of this fund.

The Indians can not sue unless they are enabled to do it by an enabling act. They are not recognized in our form of government any more than a private citizen for the purpose of bringing a suit against the Government or other parties. This provision is intended simply to do this: To effectuate the jurisdiction of the court over this whole subject without limitation, for it is apparent if the court decides that there is no valid and lawful claim against this fund under the Bryan contract, then it belongs to the Indians as a necessary consequence of the authority of the court. But the simple fact is that, pending long years of unascertained and indefinite claims by these Old Settlers against the Government of the United States, the matter was referred for settlement to the proper executive authority (the administrative department of the Government), adjudicated, and finally partially paid.

During that progress of time the Indian tribe, with due authority, in compliance with the statute whose provisions are sought to be suspended now for the simple purpose of this action, and to enable those Indians separated from the tribe to make their claim in court, who may not be in the proper and strict tribal organization, the attorney of the tribe, complying with that statute in all those respects, made this contract to set aside a thirty-fifth part of an undefined and unascertained sum of money for this claim. It was approved by the Interior Department; it has been repeatedly affirmed by Congress, and the question before the court will be whether or not that thirty-fifth part of this sum so recognized, so approved, and so decided by Congress and by the executive department shall be retained, for whose benefit? For the benefit of the valid contract made, and for services performed. That is the whole question.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I may be mistaken about it, but I do not understand this amendment as does the Senator from Florida. The Senator states that, after all, this is an amendment for the benefit of the Indians. It would seem from the statement of the Senator that the Indian is seeking to have this amendment incorporated in the bill. If so, the Indian must be very badly advised. The bill as it came from the House contained a provision to the effect that the money should be turned over absolutely to the Indians. This amendment, if it has any object at all, is to give a right to those who claim a part of this money to sue in the Court of Claims to recover the same.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. To whom, by the bill as it came from the House, is the money to be paid—to what Cherokees? The Cherokees embraced in this suspension of the act? Not at all. Under the House bill it would go to the regular tribal organization.

Mr. WHITE. Very well. The House bill is specific about it.

Mr. CALL. Therefore I was strictly correct when I said the effect of this provision in the bill was to give the benefit to the Indians which they would not otherwise have—not to the tribal Indians, but to the others.

Mr. WHITE. There may be some other Indian who has not a claim against this fund who has not yet appeared, but, as we now know, the Indians described in the House bill from line 10, on page 69, to the end of line 2, on page 70, are the Indians who are concerned. Now, what is the status of this matter?

Mr. CALL. The Senator will allow me a moment.

Mr. WHITE. Very well.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Connecticut rose in his place and stated that the purpose of this provision was to benefit the North Carolina portion of the Indians, who were separated from the regular tribal organization.

Mr. WHITE. The language seems plain enough to me. As I said before, I may be mistaken about it, but the amendment which is proposed here is in its effect practically to give the right to the gentlemen who claim to have rendered legal services to these Indians to bring suit and to recover such money as the court may award, provided that when the Indians or other claimants appear and contest, they will find this provision of law:

> No action shall be barred or right impaired by reason of any previous award, payment, or ruling made by the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, we learn from this debate that at the last session of Congress the power was given to the Secretary of the Interior to settle this matter, and that some of these claimants, at least, appeared before him, an award was made, and they pocketed their money. Some of them may have protested, claiming that they ought to get more; but they appeared before the tribunal established pursuant to law, having exclusive jurisdiction; they took their money, and they went their way.

As I said a moment ago, this award was either a valid award, made under a valid act of Congress, or it was no award at all; it was invalid. If it was valid, it ought to bind those gentlemen who presented their claims and who entered into that litigation. If it was not valid, it could not bind them, regardless of the recitations of this act. Hence the language criticised by the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN], it seems to me, ought to be extended; indeed, I do not believe that any part of the amendment is as it ought to be.

The Indian may and ought very often to receive consideration from Congress not accorded others who come here, but to say that the Indians have outwitted these lawyers, and that these lawyers who have been struggling for years for the Indians were cheated and swindled before the tribunal appointed by Congress, is to me an absurdity. The poor Indian for once in his life has met the astute lawyer in the arena of discussion before the tribunal established to adjudicate his rights, and has prevailed, and now because the unfortunate white man has been beaten in that contest, we are to pass a law to give him another chance so that the poor man may not go into insolvency and die thinking that Congress has not given him a fair chance before his rival and superior, the remnant of the American Indians!

Mr. CALL. That is a very romantic statement of the Senator from California, but it has no more reference to this case than if he had been talking about the arbitration treaty. There was no tribunal established by Congress; there was no question as between the Indian and these claimants. There was simply an authority on the part of the Secretary of the Interior to take testimony and ascertain and fix the proportion which, in his judgment, should be paid to these people. It was not an award; it had none of the qualities of a legal award; it was not submitted as an award.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALL. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. If it was not an award, why do you call it an award in this amendment, and ask that that award may not be set up as a defense?

Mr. CALL. That is just like the Senator and myself do by the misuse of language.

Mr. WHITE. I am not responsible for it.

Mr. CALL. That is occasioned by using expressions which do not import technically and literally the sense in which they are used. That is the reason it was not an award and could not be an award. It was simply a submission to the executive officer of this Government to perform an administrative function, for which he was responsible, in the nature of things, to Congress, and which required subsequent approval; and it was not at the last session of Congress, but it was a number of sessions ago, and it has been repeatedly done in the course of the history of this claim.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator permit me another question?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. If the award of the Secretary of the Interior was subject to approval by Congress, was the payment to the attorneys by the Secretary of the Interior under that award illegal and void?

Mr. CALL. Certainly not, unless it should be subsequently declared by Congress that the claim was a fraud and therefore void. That is the reason. It was not a finality. But suppose it had been intended to be a finality, and there had been a manifest error, or even fraud and an improper proceeding, would it be binding upon the supreme legislative power of the country?

The question here is simply to decide whether or not this 85 per cent of that total amount was in proper form directed to be paid, and whether it was a valid contract; and if so, who are the parties to receive it. That question is broadly opened in this amendment for the Indians to contest a matter which has been decided and affirmed and reaffirmed in all the Departments of this Government; and it was intended by the committee, and only intended, that that question should be opened to the court in its broadest sense. That is the whole story in regard to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHILTON. Let the amendment be again reported, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Utah to the committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out after the word "issue," in line 5, on page 72, the following:

> And no right of either party shall be impaired by reason of any previous award or ruling by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that the yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment to the amendment. Does the Senator desire a call of the Senate?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do. I desire to precede the yeas and nays by a call for a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Cullom,	McBride,	Sewell,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, before this amendment is voted upon, I wish to say that it does seem to me that some statement ought to be made which justifies the striking out by statute of a defense to which these Indians may now be entitled. It is possible that some statement has already been made when I have not been present in the Senate which would justify the action of the Committee on Appropriations, but I can not conceive of any such justification.

I have said that there may possibly be a reason sometimes for removing the bar of the statute of limitations, but that is not what is proposed here. So far as we know, there is no bar created by the statute of limitations, but here is a proposition that if these Indians have paid and settled, and obtained a release of those claims, those facts shall constitute no defense in the suit now brought against them; that all the statutory protection shall be taken away; that the necessity of showing a written contract shall be removed; that the Court of Claims shall simply ladle out this money to the various claimants who come before it according as they may deem just and equitable, and no possible bar shall be interposed if there ever once existed a right of action.

If an attorney brought in a claim for $30,000, and after controversy there has been an adjudication that he is entitled to $20,000, and he has received it, expended it, and given a receipt for it, released all claim to it, still the proposition of the committee was that the Indians, at their own expense in defending the case, should be compelled to try over again the whole subject-matter of the controversy, and the Court of Claims, if it saw fit, should give the money to the claimant.

I do insist that there shall be some sort of a logical, reasonable, equitable demonstration here or an attempt to demonstrate here that these Indians should not be entitled to all of the same defenses which an individual would be entitled to under similar circumstances or the United States itself would be entitled to under the same circumstances. Hardly within my memory have I known Congress to pass a law that in a suit in the Court of Claims against the Government itself a previous release should be waived; that the Government of the United States should try over again a case which it had once successfully defended or had settled at an agreed sum which had been received and receipt taken therefor.

I urge that this injustice may not be done to these Indians; that if we give these plaintiffs a right of action in court, they shall go there and prove their just and equitable claim. The words "just and equitable" are an intimation to the Court of Claims, and an unsatisfactory intimation to me, that the court is expected to deal very liberally with these plaintiffs. It is an intimation that the court is not to give them their strict contract rights, their plain contract rights, but that it is to be just to the claimants, that it is to be equitable to them. In effect, the language is an intimation to the court that if, upon the whole, the attorneys had better have this money than the Indians, the court shall give it to them. It looks to me as if the whole amendment was constructed upon the theory that it would be the height of folly to let the Indians have any more of this money. Here it is—$80,000; it belongs to the Indians; they claim it; they cancel all these contracts or pretended contracts that have been set up, and say they want this money, and the House of Representatives has said that they shall have the money. And now we do what? We do not simply say this money shall not be paid out until the attorneys have brought suit in the Court of Claims to recover what is due them, which would be a provision that could be written in four lines, a provision that this sum of money shall be subjected to the lawful claims of any parties who choose to sue therefor, but it is a long, carefully constructed effort to keep this money from the Indians and to give it to these lawyers, nearly all of whom have been paid once, and, in my judgment, have been paid far more than their services were worth. Now, however, they are to be allowed to double up and to get the rest of this money, for fear that by some possibility it may turn out that these Indians have actually got, belonging to themselves and subject to no further charges in behalf of attorneys and claim agents, the sum of $80,000 specified in the amendment.

Mr. President, why, when we do all this, should we go out of the way to strike down any proper and rightful defense which these Indians have? Why should not they be allowed the same privilege that private individuals would be allowed? Why should not these helpless people be allowed the same privilege of making defense in court that the most intelligent white citizens have? Why should not they have the advantage of making every defense which the United States itself would make if this money had to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States? I am utterly unable to answer that question. I have not heard a single suggestion which has made any impression upon my mind in favor of the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LINDSAY. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question, if it is agreeable. Does the Senator concede the correctness of the proposition which the amendment seems to assume, that 35 per cent of this money was set apart for Bryan and his associates, who represented the Indians as attorneys?

Mr. CHANDLER. Thirty-five per cent?

Mr. LINDSAY. That 35 per cent of the gross amount was properly set apart to pay the attorneys?

Mr. CHANDLER. It was set apart to pay the legal expenses, certainly. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. LINDSAY. No; I can not give any information. I am trying to get information.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator what is the pertinency of his question?

Mr. LINDSAY. It is this: If 35 per cent was properly set apart, then what interest have the Indians in this litigation at all?

Mr. CHANDLER. It was the money of the Indians.

Mr. LINDSAY. But if it was set apart to pay the attorneys, then it ceased to be the money of the Indians.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Indians, instead of taking all their money and dividing it or arranging to divide it, provided that 35 per cent should remain somewhere, just as the Senator, going on a journey, puts $200 in his pocket with which to travel. That does not entitle the railroad company, if the fare is $50, to demand the whole $200 of him, because he set it apart for his journey. The money was the money of the Indians, and this fund was reserved as a maximum fund, the Senator will understand. The Indians went on and made contracts, and they made contracts under the protection of this law, sections 2103 and 2104 of the statutes, and I am willing to vote to let the claimants to this fund who have contracts made in accordance with these statutes go into court and recover whatever they are entitled to, although most of them have already been paid once. But for them to come in and say to the Indians, as the Senator will see, "You set apart 35 per cent, and we have done the work and got the money for 20 per cent; now, the other 15 per cent belongs to us, not to you," would be an effrontery on the part of these attorneys that I do not think would be considered as professional in Kentucky or New Hampshire or anywhere else.

Mr. LINDSAY. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire, if he be right, that the 35 per cent was only tentatively set apart out of which the attorneys were to be paid whatever was proved due them. Then, I say everything ought to be left open for adjudication. But if, as claimed by the Senator from Florida, and if, as the amendment seems to assume, the original contract set apart 35 per cent of whatever might be recovered to the attorneys, then I can not see what interest the Indians have in this litigation.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator would be right if 35 per cent had been set apart and contracted out to one set of attorneys or to any number of attorneys, but that is not true.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is just what I am trying to find out, whether it is true.

Mr. CHANDLER. The 35 per cent was set apart, and the Indians proceeded to make contracts. Every man who could persuade them that he could do some lobby work in Washington to help them to get the $800,000 got a contract, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs approved it, and the Secretary of the Interior approved it, and the judge certified to it under the statute which the Senator from Florida is now studying with great care. These contracts did not amount to 35 per cent, and yet the lobby work was done, the $800,000 was appropriated, and the attorneys were paid all that it had been agreed to pay them. Then, behold, it was discovered that $80,000 was left. The natural course would have been to have given it to the Indians, but the attorneys then said, "This money will all be lost if we let the Indians have it. It must be that we are entitled to this." So other contracts were devised, other reasons for contracts were conjured up, other contracts were made, and now it is not only proposed that the parties who have these contracts, made in accordance with the statute, may go into court and recover what they can prove themselves entitled to of this $80,000, but that anybody else can go in and upon satisfying the court that he is justly and equitably entitled to a portion of the money for services that he is supposed to have rendered, whether or not the Indians knew anything about it, whether or not the Indians made any contract with the plaintiff, may recover, and that no forms of contract whatever need be proved in order to justify the claimant in recovering.

Then, moreover, to come back to the original point, if any one of them has taken his money and given a receipt in full, he may have another hack at this money and get another slice of it if he can.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to know where in the language which he criticises the Senator finds authority for his statement? There is nothing in the amendment which says that if an attorney has released his contract, or received payment for his contract, he can now bring a suit over again. The Senator seems to have misapprehended entirely the effect of this language.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not a bit. The Senator from Connecticut is himself all wrong.

Mr. PLATT. Let me read it.

Mr. CHANDLER. It says:

And no action shall be barred or right impaired by reason of any previous award, payment, or ruling made by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; "made by the Secretary of the Interior." That is just what there is in this whole matter that the Senator has been talking about. The matter was sent——

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Connecticut either himself answer or allow me to ask the Senator from South Dakota one question? The question is, How much money have these claimants already received? Can the Senator answer the question?

Mr. PLATT. I am unable to answer the question. I know simply that certain attorneys having contracts which ought to have been allowed, in my judgment, went to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior, in some instances, absolutely refused to allow them anything. In others he allowed them only a part of what they ought to have had. All there is about this language is that the action of the Secretary of the Interior in that respect shall not be final. There is nothing else to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly a payment may be a discharge of the right of action. The Senator will admit that.

Mr. PLATT. Payment by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very good. It may be a discharge and it may not be a discharge, because it may be a payment on account. What I want to get at is why the committee proposed—I suppose they have abandoned the proposition now; I understand they do—that no payment should have been a settlement; why the committee should have deliberately proposed to reopen every one of these claims and invite these attorneys to come in and again dip their pails into the fountain and pull out another share of this money?

If the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] will give me his attention, I desire to say that I notice that 35 per cent, or so much of the amount as may be necessary, was set apart and held for the purpose of paying the expenses of collecting this claim. So it is entirely clear that the fixing of the 35 per cent at the time it was fixed as the sum which might be required to lobby the $800,000 claim through Congress created no obligation on the part of the Indians who arranged to withhold it or set it aside to give it to the men who worked for them. They were bound to pay the men who worked for them exactly what they agreed to pay them—no more and no less. But the attorneys discovered that here was this $80,000, and they felt about it just as Department or Bureau officers do under the Government. If Congress appropriates for a particular object $100,000 and the Bureau chiefs find they can accomplish the result for $90,000, they never say that they have saved $10,000 of the $100,000 appropriation. They always say they have lost it, because they have not expended it. These attorneys, instead of saying, "As we render an account of our stewardship, we have collected this $800,000 claim; we have taken $200,000 of it ourselves, and we have saved $80,000 of the 35 per cent for the Indians," say, "Why, lo and behold, we have lost $80,000."

They have been at work ever since to get it, and they are in a fair way to get it, because they got up these contracts and they ran them through the tribe in ways that are dark. They got the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior to approve them and a judge to certify that they were all right, and now they are to be given by Congress a standing in court for the collection of these claims. In addition, we are to invite in everybody else who can prove that he loafed around the hotels in Washington or hung about the Departments or traveled through the corridors of Congress and advised A, B, C, and D to vote for the Old Settlers' claim, whether or not the Indians ever recognized his services, whether or not the Indians ever knew of his service—they are invited to prove to the Court of Claims that, as this money ought under no circumstances to go back to the Indians, because it would be lost if it does, they are entitled to a certain share of the $80,000. We invite them in by striking down all these deliberately and carefully enacted statutes which the Senator from Florida is studying so intently. We strike those statutes down and invite in this horde of attorneys to see if they can not conjure up evidence enough, without any such proof as the statute requires, to enable them to grab a portion of this money.

I certainly hope that the Appropriations Committee, which have a great deal of business on their hands, several important appropriation bills to carry through Congress which seem likely to be loaded with legislation, will consent to modify this clause depriving the Indians of defenses to which they are entitled; that they will consent to let those statutes remain in full force and vigor, as they ought to remain, and send these attorneys and claim agents to the Court of Claims to recover, if they are entitled to recover, according to the law of the land as it now stands upon the statute books. I hope that the committee will not press this effort of theirs to secure a judgment in advance by adding to the clause that gives the court jurisdiction all these other provisions intended to make the pathway of these claimants to this fund of $80,000 easy and quick and safe.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] will point out anywhere in this provision anything that will justify a statement he has repeated here from six to twenty times since he commenced his speech, that an attorney having been paid by the Indians and having given a receipt under seal can come in and make a claim, I should like him to do so. He has repeated it over and over again.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will repeat it again, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. TELLER. I have no doubt the Senator would. With that sense of irresponsibility in the matter which sometimes characterizes people, he can make that statement.

Mr. CHANDLER. What does the word "payment" mean, I ask the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TELLER. The word "payment" is stricken out.

Mr. CHANDLER. What did it mean when the Senator proposed it?

Mr. TELLER. It meant simply this: The question was submitted to the Secretary of the Interior without the consent of any of these people. They claimed that the Secretary of the Interior had not dealt fairly with them. The Committee on Indian Affairs, after an examination, not such as the Senator has made, but after a careful examination, said they thought he had not dealt fairly with them. The Committee on Appropriations last year thought he had not dealt fairly with them. With a good deal more information on the subject than the Senator ever had or ever will have on this particular subject, I think he did not deal fairly with them.

I know in one instance, where the parties, I thought, had rendered very little service, they received their claim in full. In another case, where I know the attorney had rendered more service than any other individual, he received 5 per cent of the entire claim. It is to correct those inequalities that the committee proposes that the case shall go to the court and that the court shall determine what is fair and what is just.

The Committee on Indian Affairs undertook to do that themselves last year, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was then very vigorous against it, and said the case ought to go to the Court of Claims. Now he comes in here and tells us that these men have received more than they ought to receive. The Senator from New Hampshire does not know who these attorneys are, except as he saw the list last year. He has no personal knowledge of what they had received; he has no personal knowledge of what their services were, and yet he tells us that he thinks they have had more than they are entitled to. If called upon to state what the service of any attorney has been, he would be unable to state it. If called upon to state what the attorney had received, he would be unable to state it; and yet, Mr. President, that is the argument which is used against this amendment. This amendment is intended to protect the Indians as much as the attorneys.

Here is a carefully prepared provision that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall look after their interests and employ counsel to see that there is no wrong done them. There is a provision here that two sections of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended. It is a question whether those provisions would be invoked one way or the other. If they could be invoked at all, it would be to say that these people were not a tribe at the time, and therefore could not make a contract that was valid at all. The whole amendment proceeds upon the theory that these people have rendered valuable service to the Indians, for which they are entitled in justice and right to be paid, and which a better class of Indians admit they are entitled to.

Mr. WHITE. Will it interrupt the Senator from Colorado if I ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. WHITE. I understand the Senator from Colorado to state that in one instance at least he thinks that some attorney or attorneys were overpaid, rather that the Secretary gave them more than they were equitably entitled to. If in that case the money was accepted, as I suppose under those circumstances it certainly would have been with avidity, can we reach it at all under this proposed act?

Mr. TELLER. In one case which I referred to the parties got all that their written contract called for, and of course they never appeared to ask for any more.

Mr. WHITE. And if it was too much, nothing could be done about it.

Mr. TELLER. Nothing could be done about it, of course. They will not appear. On the other hand, parties having written contracts, and having rendered, in my judgment, very much better and more valuable service, received a mere trifle. It was to correct these inequalities that we propose to send this matter to the court, and it goes there guarded in every particular. I do not fancy very much the insinuation of the Senator from New Hampshire that this provision is brought here in the interest of claimants. It is brought here in the interest of justice and right. If these Indians made these contracts and had the services of these people to secure what they never would have secured from the Government without that service, they ought to pay for it. They have not paid for it, and here is a fund that they had practically set apart themselves for the payment. They said to their agent, Mr. Bryan, "Go to Washington, and you may use to the extent of 35 per cent of all you can get; you may hire attorneys and agree to pay them, but you must not exceed that sum." Bryan came here and stayed here twenty years before he got this debt paid. Finally he employed attorneys who secured a provision, as I mentioned before, for a commission out of which grew the determined obligation of the Government to pay this debt, and these are the people who rendered the service and secured it. The Government of the United States would never have done it; the Indians could not do it, and the people who have rendered the service claim that they have not been paid.

Out of the 35 per cent, not eighty-odd thousand dollars, as the Senator stated, but seventy-odd thousand dollars is to be paid, if the court find that these people have earned it; and that is all there is in it. The committee have no more interest in it than anybody else. The committee have been as anxious to secure to the Indian his protection as anybody can be. We put in here a provision that service shall be made upon the Commissioner, that he might know. We put in here ex industria a provision that it was his business to look after the interests of the Indian and see that proper defense was made. Having provided that this defense is not to made by the Indians, but to be made by the United States, at the expense of the Indians, having put the United States in front of them, I think it is safe enough to say that they can have justice in the court, if there is any justice to be had in the courts at all. I struck out of the line the word "payment," which the Senator objected to, and I changed it, although I do not think it changed the meaning at all; for I intended it to mean that. I struck out the words "and no action shall be barred," and so forth, and changed it to meet the suggestion of some Senators. What we wanted to say (and there need be no misunderstanding) was that the Secretary of the Interior has made an adjudication that is unsatisfactory. We are going to let the court take it upon justice and equity and see whether it is rightfully made or not; and that is all there is of it.

Mr. President, in these last hours of the session, I do not propose to spend any further time over this matter. If it does not go to the court, it will come back here again to plague us at the next session. If it goes to the court, the court will settle it in some way, and that will be the end of it.

Mr. PALMER. It is true that this amendment provides that "service of notice of suit upon the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall be sufficient service upon said Indians, and it shall be his duty to see that the rights of the Indians are protected;" but ordinarily an award, if accepted, would bind white people in any court, even though there be some defect in the authority of the arbitrator. If the award were accepted, it would bind in a court of law. In order, therefore, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall be the better able to defend and protect the rights of the Indians, it is provided that—

No action shall be barred or right impaired by reason of any previous award, payment, or ruling made by the Secretary of the Interior.

That is found on page 72.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator is aware that that clause has been amended, is he not?

Mr. PALMER. I am not sure but that it has been amended.

Mr. TELLER. It has already been amended by striking out the words "action shall be barred," and, after the word "right," by inserting "of either party;" so that it will read: "and no right of either party shall shall be impaired by reason of any previous award;" and the word "payment" is stricken out.

Mr. PALMER. Still, Mr. President, the fact of payment would be a fact which would attend an award. If there was an award or ruling and the party accepted the result of that award or ruling, it would bind him in any court. Even the words "award and ruling" would be quite sufficient if it was proved in pais that the party had accepted or acted upon the award or ruling. In order to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to protect the rights of these Indians, it is proposed to strike out that provision; in order that he may the better defend and protect the rights of the Indians, I propose the legal validation of his contract. The words "which can sue and be sued" would not control this matter of right; they would not validate the contract. It would give the Old Settler Indians a standing in the court, but the validation of the contract is something more than I suppose was intended. The truth about it is that if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs attempts to protect the rights of these Indians he is, to use a very common phrase, "hamstrung;" he is powerless; he can do nothing. The contract is validated; there is no bar permitted on account of a previous award, and two sections of the statutes that relate to contracts with Indians are suspended for the purposes of this case. Thus the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is stripped of all power to protect the rights of the Indians and the duty imposed upon the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in terms is a mere mockery; he is powerless; he can do nothing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question arises upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment of the committee. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out, after the word "issue," in line 5, on page 72, the words:

And no right of either party shall be impaired by reason of any previous award or ruling made by the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARTER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. McBRIDE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to state that I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD].

Mr. VILAS. If there is no quorum present, I shall vote, because under the arrangement with my pair I am at liberty to vote on questions like the one pending. I vote "yea."

Mr. McBRIDE. In order to make a quorum, I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], but as I think he would vote as I do, I will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 26; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend the amendment, in line 8, page 72, by adding after the words "Secretary of the Interior" the words:

Unless such award has been paid to and accepted by the claimant.

I move this amendment because it was said here by the friends of the change that if it had been paid to and accepted by them of course that would be another question. I suggest that, if it has been paid to and accepted by a claimant, it ought to be a reason which the Indian may urge in a court of justice.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There seems to be great misapprehension with regard to the claim of these attorneys exhibited, especially by the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who I supposed had become educated on this subject last year. We then discussed the merits of this case for days, and the Senate decided to distribute this money among the attorneys. Now we come in here with a provision to send it to the Court of Claims and allow the Indians to come in, if they have any claim, and have it adjudicated, and that is not satisfactory.

The facts are that twenty-five years ago these Old Settler Cherokees made a contract with one of their own number, Joel M. Bryan, to come to Washington and try to collect certain money which they claimed was due them. They set apart 35 per cent of the fund to pay expenses and authorized him to employ other attorneys to assist him in securing it. He spent twenty years here. He advanced his own money, sold his farm, his home, and his mill, gave his entire attention, made more than a hundred trips back and forth in procuring testimony, and finally succeeded in securing a claim of about $800,000. In the meantime, on account of the hardships which he had suffered, the large sums of money which he had expended, the dissipation of his entire fortune, they made a new contract with him and provided that if there was anything left of the 35 per cent after paying the expenses of the attorneys it should go to Joel M. Bryan, their attorney and commissioner.

They made a contract hedged about by all the provisions of law; made a contract which was approved by the Interior Department. It was never questioned until about two years ago. Then, encouraged by the speeches and conduct of certain Senators who are always so solicitous about the poor Indian, the council of the Cherokee Nation got together and undertook to repudiate the contract with Joel M. Bryan. That contract is still in force. The Indians have no interest in this controversy, absolutely no interest whatever. If those attorneys are defeated whose contracts are included in this provision, Joel M. Bryan gets every dollar which is left, and not a penny will go to the Indians under any circumstances, unless the Court of Claims, taking everything into consideration, decides that a portion shall go to the Indians.

I contend, Mr. President, that the Indians have no right here, no claim here whatever; that whatever there is that does not go to other claimants goes to Joel M. Bryan, and that, as the matter stands to-day as adjudicated by the Secretary of the Interior, this whole amount belongs to Joel M. Bryan. Last year we divided it among the attorneys, giving Joel M. Bryan a portion of it; but Bryan consented to that division. He was 86 years old, and the ten or fifteen thousand dollars that he was to receive was sufficient, he believed, to support him the remainder of his life. Rather than be subject to a constant pursuit of this matter, he concluded to take a settlement and drop the controversy, and the Senate by a large majority decided that way. Now we are trying to dispose of it again, and the same opposition is presented, and the day is spent in talk.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. What became of it last year?

Mr. PETTIGREW. The other House refused to agree to the Senate amendment in conference. It was finally agreed to drop it out. The House of Representatives, however, offered to send the matter to the Court of Claims, and I believe the Senate voted not to send it to the Court of Claims. That proposition had been presented. Now the committee propose to send it to the Court of Claims, and the same Senators who objected last year object again. They talk about the interest of the poor Indian. The people who would get this money if it were undertaken to pay it to the tribe are white men from the Indian Territory, unscrupulous men, men who have lived off the Indians and have become rich plundering the so-called Indians of that country for securing legislation here. They are, after all, the poor Indians for whom New England pleads.

I have sometimes wondered why there was such a vast amount of anxiety from New England about the poor Indians; but it is easy to understand. It is in atonement for the past, for the wrongs of their ancestors; for I think it is well understood that after having made a saint of Miles Standish for murdering Indians in cold blood, those they did not sell into slavery they put on an island in Boston Harbor and starved to death.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator why he proposes this amendment, which provides that if those parties have accepted payment in full, substantially that there shall not be a bar to any further claim?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will answer the Senator. Joel M. Bryan, as the facts show, had returned to him simply the money he had paid out. He took it, but he did not relinquish any part of the equity and justice of his claim. He only received the money he had actually expended in prosecuting this case, and received no salary, no fees for the twenty years of time which he has spent here. I do not think that an amendment should be placed in this bill to refuse him any further relief when every dollar of this money that does not go to these attorneys goes, under contract, to the Indians.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from South Dakota permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. As I understand, this bill makes no provision for the payment of money back into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior in cases where a virtual recision is sought here. Here the party to whom the Senator refers accepted the money; but the Senator says it was not enough, non constat, that the Court of Claims should award that much. Now, does the Senator claim that the party has a right to retain that money which he has received from a tribunal which he claims treated him unjustly and resubmit his case to another tribunal, and, in case of a judgment for a less amount than that rendered by the other tribunal, he will stand upon the judgment of the first?

Mr. HOAR. I submit that a clear answer to that is to say, as the Senator from South Dakota says, that Indians were starved to death in Boston Harbor two hundred and fifty years ago.

Mr. WHITE. That answer does appear conclusive.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to an amendment on the part of the Senator from California covering the question which he asks. I presume that some of these people are satisfied. I understand that there were favorites in the distribution made by the Interior Department; that the full limit of all that was called for under the contract was awarded to some of these people, while to one man whom I have in mind there was paid but $8,000, although he had spent nearly twelve years prosecuting this case, and the payment he received was less than a fifth of the amount to which he was entitled under his contract. I think he is entitled to relief, and I do not believe he should be barred by the arbitrary conduct of the Interior Department, made, perhaps, by an employee, without the careful scrutiny and consideration of the Secretary of the Interior himself.

Of course, Mr. President, I presume the answer of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] made to the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] with regard to the starving by the Puritans of the Indians of that State, was one which satisfied him, but in that connection it is no more than fair to say that the blackest page in the history of the Anglo-Saxon race is the treatment of the Indians of Massachusetts by the early settlers of that colony. There is no chapter of slave hunting in Africa so black as that chapter in the history of Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make one observation?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I do not attribute to the Senator any intentional purpose to misrepresent, but he has been deceived by some rumor without an investigation of his own. Rumor lied.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Well, we might go into that question, Mr. President. I do not know whether these are good authorities or not upon this question, but here is an extract from American Pioneers and Patriots, by J. & C. Abbott; also from "Miles Standish," by Allen, and Appleton's Bibliography:

MILES STANDISH AND HIS PROMPT TREATMENT OF THE INDIANS.

In 1623, word having been brought to Standish that certain Indians were plotting mischief and death to a small settlement of whites near Plymouth, he set out to that place with eight men. When he got there he enticed two of the chief Indian malcontents into a small room, together with a young Indian half brother of one of these chiefs. He was accompanied by two of his own people, and at a sign the door was suddenly closed. Standish threw himself on one of the chiefs, Pecksnot; one of his men jumped into the other, Wituwamet, and the third white man held the Indian youth.

Standish killed his man at once by thrusting the Indian's own knife into its owner's bosom. The other Indian was treated similarly by the white soldier, who followed the example of Standish, while the young Indian was not killed at once; he was reserved for a hanging which took place soon after.

Standish then cut off Wituwamet's head and took it back to Plymouth, where it was stuck up on the stockade as a warning to all Indians afterwards.

It is said that Standish said, when reproached for this act and when he was very much inflamed by the criticism which certain ministers of the gospel had visited on him for so doing, that "the only good Indian is a dead Indian."

Mr. President, I had supposed that phrase came from the far West, but, after all, we are forced to look to New England, and to ancient England at that, for the phrase that "the only good Indian is a dead Indian."

The reverend and pious John Robinson, who was one of the ministers who rather tried to defend Standish at the time, declared that his clerical brethren ought to bear in mind the "exceedingly warm temper of their captain:" that on the whole the chief regret that he, as a clergyman, felt, was that Standish had not given those Indians time in which to be converted before killing them.

This was the first Indian blood shed by the Pilgrims.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the general laws of Massachusetts Colony of 1660 contained this provision:

And it is ordered that no Indian shall at any time pow wow, or perform outward worship to their false gods, or to the devil, in any part of our jurisdiction, whether they shall be such as shall dwell there, or shall come hither, and if any shall transgress this law the powwower shall pay £5.

* * * Every town shall have power to restrain all Indians that shall come into their towns from profaning the Lord's day.

And it is also further ordered, that whatsoever Indians shall hereafter be taken Drunk, shall pay the sum of ten shillings or else be whipt, by laying on ten stripes, according to the discretion of the Judge, whether Magistrate or Commissioner who shall have cognizance of the case: And in all towns where no Magistrate or Commissioners are, such cases shall be judged by the Select men or major part of them.

That is to be found on page 78 of the Colonial Laws of Massachusetts. The Colonial Laws of Massachusetts also contained this provision:

At A Council, held in Boston, August the thirtieth, 1675.

Also whereas it is the manner of the heathen that are now in Hostility with us, contrary to the practice of the Civil Nations, to execute their bloody Insolences by stealth and sculking in small parties, declining all open decision of their controversie, either by Treaty or by the Sword—

It is not much a matter of surprise that the Indians should pursue this method of warfare after the introduction which they had in European civilization by the treatment which Miles Standish had given their chiefs. No wonder that they skulked and crept upon those people who assassinated men in cold blood, and Massachusetts made a saint of Miles Standish—

The Council do therefore Order; That after the Publication of the provision aforesaid, It shall be lawful for any person whether English or Indian, that shall find any Indian traveling or sculking in any of our Towns or Woods, contrary to the limits above named, to command them under their Guard, and Examination, or to kill and destroy them as they best may or can.

In other words, they were to shoot Indians on sight, and although it was unlawful to fire a gun on Sunday, I expect that it was a sufficient defense that the gun was aimed at an Indian.

The council hereby declaring that it will be most acceptable to them that none be killed or wounded that are willing to surrender themselves into custody. (Page 223, Colonial Laws of Massachusetts.)

And also the following:

The court doth therefore order and declare:
Secondly. That there be a guard appointed at the end of the said town toward Roxbury, to hinder the coming in of any Indian, until application be first made to the governor, or council if sitting, and then to be admitted with a guard of two musketeers and to be remanded back with the same guard, not to be suffered to lodge in town, unless in prison: Provided, That if any Indian or Indians that shall be employed upon any public message or business shall come up to the said guard, they shall forthwith be conveyed to the governor or council, and be by him or them disposed of and secured during their necessary stay for the dispatch of their business, and then to be conveyed as above said. (Page 225, Colonial Laws of Massachusetts.)

But here, Mr. President, is the most interesting provision. On page 238 of the Colonial Laws of Massachusetts it was provided:

Whereas this court have for weighty reasons placed sundry Indians (that have subjected to our Government) upon some islands for their and our security:
It is ordered, That none of the said Indians shall presume to go off the said islands voluntarily upon pain of death, and it shall be lawful for the English to destroy those that they shall find straggling off from the said places of their confinement, unless taken off by order from authority and under the English guard.

In other words, if they should try to swim ashore in search of food, anyone, no matter who he was, was authorized to kill them on the spot.

And it is further ordered, That if any person or persons shall presume to take, steal, or carry away either man, woman, or child of the said Indians off from any of the said islands where they are placed, without order from the general court or council, he or they shall be accounted breakers of the capital law printed and published against manstealing, and this order to be forthwith posted and published.

If anybody tried a rescue while the Indians were calmly and quietly and submissively starving to death on this island in Boston Harbor, he was guilty of a capital offense, and punished accordingly.

Mr. LODGE. I ask where the Senator finds the statement that the Indians were starving to death? They were undoubtedly prisoners in Boston Harbor, but where does he find the statement that they were starving to death?

Mr. PETTIGREW. They were undoubtedly placed there for the purpose of having them starve to death.

Mr. LODGE. That is merely your assertion; that is not history.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Well, Mr. President, here is some history that will, perhaps, justify the supposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire for a question.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator kindly tell us where he was born? [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIGREW. I judge from the manner in which the Senator has asked the question that he himself has some idea of the answer. Therefore, it is unnecessary for me to inform him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will inform the Senate shortly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota declines to state where he was born. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIGREW. The remark of the Chair, of course, is one that is entirely voluntary and perhaps a little out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PETTIGREW. But as the present occupant of the chair is not to dwell with us long, we can endure almost anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will endure the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In John S. C. Abbott's History of King Philip, I find the following:

In a battle at Dartmouth, in 1675, in which Captain Church, of Narragansett Bay, commanded the colonists, they took 160 Indians prisoners, who had been induced by promises of kind treatment to come in and surrender themselves. To the extreme indignation of Captain Church, all these people, in most dishonorable disregard of the pledges of the capitulation, were sold by the Plymouth authorities into slavery. This act was as impolitic as it was criminal. It can not be too sternly denounced. It effectually deterred others from confiding in the English.

It is remarkable that it deterred them from confiding in the English.

The historian gives this account of the scenes in a captured Indian palisade at South Kingston, in 1675:

The interior was a large Indian village, containing 500 houses, stored with an abundance of corn and crowded with women and children. An awful scene of carnage now ensued. Though the savages fought with the utmost fury, they could oppose no successful resistance to the disciplined courage of the English. Flying from wigwam to wigwam, men, women, and children were struck down without mercy. The exasperated colonists regarded the children as but young serpents of a venomous brood, and they were pitilessly knocked in the head. The women they shot as readily as they would the dam of the wolf or the bear.

Of the South Kingston affair, Rev. Mr. Ruggles wrote (and is quoted by the historian):

The burning of the wigwams, the shrieks and cries of the women and children, and the yells of the warriors exhibited a most horrible and affecting scene, so that it greatly moved some of the soldiers. They were in much doubt then, and often seriously inquired whether burning their enemies alive could be consistent with humanity and the benevolent principles of the gospel.

Abbott's history of King Philip, in commenting on the capture of Mrs. Rowlandson at the time of the massacre at Lancaster, in 1676, says:

When Mrs. Rowlandson was driven from the flames of her dwelling, a Narragansett Indian was the first to grasp her; he consequently claimed her as his property. Her children were caught by different savages, and thus became the slaves of their captors. The Indians, by the law of retaliation, were perfectly justified in making slaves of their captives. * * * The English made all their captives slaves, and women and children were sold to all the horrors of the West Indian plantation bondage.

The wife and son of King Philip were captured in battle at Bridgewater in 1677. The historian records this fact:

Philip had by some unknown means escaped. With grief and shame we record that his wife and son were sent to Bermuda and sold as slaves, and were never heard of more.

Princess Wetamoo, King Philip's brother's widow, was ambuscaded by the colonists in 1673. Of this affair the historian says:

The heroic queen, too proud to be captured, instantly threw off her clothing, seized a broken piece of wood, and plunged into the stream. Worn down by exhaustion and famine, her nerveless arm failed her and she sank beneath the waves. Her body was soon after found washed upon the shore. As faithful chroniclers, we must declare, though with a blush, that the English cut off her head and set it upon a pole in their streets, a trophy ghastly, bloody, revolting.

Mr. President, it is no wonder that with this introduction to the Anglo-Saxon race the American Indians have resisted the encroachment of the whites across the continent—their children captured, sold into slavery, killed, ambushed, assassinated without the least reluctance or remorse. It was the common practice of the people of New England in their dealings with the Indians to sell into slavery all those they took prisoners of war. They said the Indians made bad slaves; that they were willful and stubborn, and so they traded them in the West Indies for negroes. They traded them in Cuba and the other islands of the Caribbean Sea for molasses, and returning home with the molasses, made it into rum, and sent the rum to Africa to trade for slaves in order to stock their plantations. So I say that the blackest page, not alone in our history, but in the history of the world almost, is that of the treatment of the Indians by the people of Massachusetts and the conduct of the early inhabitants of those provinces.

Here is another extract:

In 1643 Emanuel Downing, the foremost lawyer in the colony and a leader of commanding influence as well as high connections, made a written argument in favor of a war with the Narragansetts. He did not pretend that any wrong had been done: but he had a pious dread that Massachusetts would be held responsible for the false religion of the Narragansetts. "I doubt," says he, "if it be not synne in us, having power in our hands, to suffer them to maynteyne the worship of the devil which their powwows often doe." "If," says he, "upon a just war, the Lord shall deliver them into our hand, wee might easily have men, women, and children enough to exchange for Moors (negroes), which will be more gaynefull pilladge for us than wee conceive; for I do not see how wee can thrive untill wee get in a stock of slaves sufficient to do all our business."

This is Downing's letter, in Moore, on page 10.

In a book written by Du Bois on the Suppression of the Slave Trade, I find the following:

Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut were largely engaged in the slave trade, and New Hampshire to some extent. This trade declined very little till the Revolution. Newport was a mart for slaves offered for sale in the North and a point of reshipment for all slaves. It was principally this trade that raised Newport to her commercial importance in the eighteenth century. Connecticut, too, was an important slave trader, sending large numbers of horses and other commodities to the West Indies in exchange for slaves, and selling the slaves in other colonies. Owners of slaves carried slaves to South Carolina, and brought home naval stores for their shipbuilding; or to the West Indies, and brought home molasses. The molasses was made into the highly prized New England rum, which was shipped to Africa and traded for more slaves. * * * Massachusetts annually distilled 15,000 hogsheads of molasses into rum. * * * Although in earlier times the most reputable New England people took ventures in slave-trading voyages, yet there gradually arose a moral sentiment which tended to make the business somewhat disreputable. * * * It was not until 1787-88 that slave trading became an indictable offense in any New England State.

I thought this related to the sale of Indians, but I see that it relates simply to the slave trade generally. I did not intend to read it, and will read no further.

I had often wondered why we had heard so much from New England in regard to the wrongs of the Western Indians. The Indian Rights Association are more active about the Indians who are most distant from them. This inquiry led me to look up the early history of the people of the colonies in their treatment of the Indians, and it revealed to me the reason why tradition, carried from one to the other, crossed the continent and made the Indians so jealous of the encroachments of the whites and so earnest that the contact should not be near or close. I am not surprised.

Neither do I object to the philanthropy of New England. I wish it would bear fruit sufficient in some measure to compensate for the wrongs of the past in their conduct toward these people.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have noticed that when anyone wants to cover up or defend anything that is thoroughly sneaky he tries to divert attention by mousing into the ancient history of New England, now nearly three hundred years old, and getting up a discussion on that.

Now, here is a question about which I have no knowledge, whether a certain trust fund belongs to some lawyers or to an Indian tribe, and whether certain transactions that have taken place in the past amount to an adjudication of that question. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] has prepared himself very carefully by, I suspect, making more historical study than he ever made in all the rest of his life put together into the treatment by Miles Standish of certain Indians in the year 1623, now two hundred and seventy-four years ago. That is the only argument he has made on his side, so far as anybody has heard it.

Mr. President, undoubtedly there were at that day some cruel, unjust, and evil things done by the early settlers of New England, as brave, God-fearing, liberty-loving men as ever lived, who, by the common consent of all mankind, brought over the torch of liberty to this country. The transaction which the Senator dwells on chiefly, the seizing of these three Indians by Miles Standish, was as brave and righteous a deed as was ever done. The Pilgrims of Plymouth had treated the Indians with the most absolute kindness. They paid honestly for every foot of their land. They visited them in sickness and relieved them in hunger. They discovered that a widespread plot, extending all over that territory, stirred up by some foreign adventurers, had been forming among the Indians to destroy and cut off their entire colony, man, woman, and child. At one time Miles Standish's entire army was eight men. There were but a hundred persons in all who came over, and fifty of them died the first winter, and not a man of the entire colony went back in the Mayflower in the spring. They planted this seed of the tree of liberty under which the people of this country live and the people of the whole world are coming to live.

In 1623 I suppose there might have been 50 or 75 men fit to bear arms in the whole colony, of whom Miles Standish was the commander. The Indians had made an appointment to meet him and some delegates in council, and had plotted to seize him and all the men who were with him and put them to death. Standish, with the spirit of a true soldier, having a gift like that of Napoleon, or of the bravest general who ever lived, instead of remaining quiet at home, went to the place of appointment with these men, and when the leaders of the conspirators came in he put them to death, and hung one of them up by the side of the fort, and defied the Indians who were gathering there. If that act had not been done, or a half hour had gone by before it was done, the entire ancestry of more than a third of the population of this country that came from that little circle of a few towns would have perished. It was a great, brave, righteous deed.

The Senator talks about and quotes a law under which, during the bloody King Philip war, when white women were being slaughtered by the tomahawk and the knife, and dwellings were being burned at midnight, there was provision that if the Indian captives strayed off from the island they should be shot. There are men within the sound of my voice who have belonged, on both sides, to military forces who have applied that precise doctrine to prisoners of war in a contest between civilized States within the last thirty years.

Now, in regard to selling the captives into slavery, it was a cruel and an evil deed. I agree with the person who has spoken that it was a cruel and an evil deed. But it was the policy of all mankind in dealing with prisoners of war down to a period long after that time. It was the crime of the age. In the great Monmouth rebellion of 1685 or 1686, the prisoners, men of gentle blood, were brought here and sold in Virginia and in New England. There is a book, 3 or 4 inches thick, published by a man named Chapman, if I have got the name right, giving the pedigrees of American families, some of them of great distinction, who were brought over here, and a great many brought to the West Indies, as prisoners in Monmouth's rebellion. There were two or three prisoners of my own name and blood, two brothers, I think of my own direct ancestor of that generation, who were brought over among that number and sold as slaves.

In Daniel Defoe's interesting novel of Colonel Jack there is the story of a person who was taken prisoner and brought over here and sold as a slave in Virginia, and the scene of the story, as Defoe describes it in those days, is about 12 miles below the Great Falls of the Potomac. I presume that that slave, whose story Defoe tells so ingeniously, wandered over the very spot where we are sitting.

Now, this thing is not a justification; it is not an excuse for the people of New England. They did some bad things. They hung nineteen persons for witchcraft, and I wonder the Senator did not get that in. Perhaps he is keeping that for another speech, when the question shall come up some time whether we shall expend $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 for coast defenses, or something of that kind. I suppose then the subject of witchcraft will be apposite in the Senator's judgment. They did that. It was a wicked, cruel delusion. But all these things which they did were done in that day by all mankind. As late as the next century women and children were hung as witches in Scotland and in England. There were, I think, 18,000 in England and Scotland punished for the crime of witchcraft. There was one German magistrate, one single, local, petty magistrate, who, down nearly to 1730, had sentenced 520 persons to death as witches in Germany. That does not excuse our ancestors at all. But it shows that all mankind come from ancestors who, when they were coming up from the monkey, or the tiger, or the ape, got to a point where they were capable of delusions and guilty of cruelty. But what I have to claim for this great people of New England is that, first of all mankind, they saw the evil and folly and the wrong of these things.

Mr. President, there are many great and heroic actions in human history. But among the greatest and the most heroic actions in human history is that of Chief Justice Sewell, the Puritan judge, who rose in his place in the crowded congregation of the First Church in Boston and stood while the pastor read from the desk his confession of the wrong and the wickedness of that judgment. And I think almost the most touching manuscript in all history is the diary where Sewell has written with his own hand the story of that witchcraft trial, and written in the margin those Latin words of interjection and sorrow, "Vae, vae, vae!" Woe, woe, woe!

I do not respect, but I only pity the man who can find in that history nothing but the material for fouling the very nest in which he was born. I do not wonder, after the speech of the Senator from South Dakota, that he declined to expose himself by answering the query of the Senator from New Hampshire where he was born. I am glad that he did not tell, and I am sure that Vermont will never tell.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, it is nearly the hour when I think we shall be obliged to adjourn. If the Senator from South Dakota will allow me to interrupt this proceeding long enough to make a suggestion respecting the bill, I shall be glad to do so.

I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the bill, until it is completed, may be limited to ten minutes for each Senator.

Mr. STEWART and others. Put it at five minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will say five minutes, if Senators think that will be time enough. I also ask unanimous consent that the votes may be taken upon the bill and all amendments beginning at 1 o'clock to-morrow. It is absolutely necessary, if we are to close the business of the session with the appropriation bills passed, that these bills shall be considered with more rapidity than they have been hitherto. So I hope we may be able to finish this bill by or before 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before assenting to the request of the Senator from Iowa, which I concede to be a proper one, I am obliged to ask him kindly to state to the Senate what may be his expectation as to the other appropriation bills. Before the Senator answers the question, if he will allow me, I wish to say that there ought to be within a day or two an opportunity for the consideration of some bills that are upon the Calendar. There are House bills upon the Calendar, and there are some Senate bills which, if they were to pass the Senate, would pass the House of Representatives. I think before fixing so short a time for voting upon this bill of abominations the Senator ought to tell us when the other appropriation bills will be brought before the Senate, and what his expectation is as to the ability of the committee, supported by the Senate, to dispose of them.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state in response to the Senator from New Hampshire that it is the expectation of the Committee on Appropriations to bring forward immediately after the conclusion of the pending bill the bill making appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia, and after that bill is concluded to bring forward the Post-Office appropriation bill, then the sundry civil bill, then the fortifications, the naval, and the deficiency appropriation bills.

Mr. CHANDLER. Six bills?

Mr. ALLISON. Six bills; and allowing one day for each of them will reach to the 3d day of March.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from California will allow me a moment further, I will say to Senators that it will be absolutely necessary after to-day for us not only to begin our sessions at 11 o'clock in the morning, but to sit also during the evenings at least until 11 or 12 o'clock. Therefore I give notice now that to-morrow evening I shall ask the Senate to go on with the appropriation bills, and after the larger bills have been disposed of, I think we can say to the Senator from New Hampshire that there will be an opportunity for reaching bills on the Calendar that are likely to be finally disposed of at the present session.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator have any objection to allowing to-morrow evening to be devoted to the consideration of bills on the Calendar?

Mr. ALLISON. I must object to it absolutely. It will be necessary for us to deal with the appropriation bills first, if they are to be considered and disposed of at this session.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I understand the Senator that the necessities of the case require the exclusion of substantially all other business until the appropriation bills are disposed of, and that we are to sit day and evening until they are disposed of.

Mr. ALLISON. Practically, that is the suggestion I wish to make.

Mr. CHANDLER. Would there be any objection to going on this evening?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from New Hampshire is, perhaps, aware of a special reason why it would be difficult for us to secure a quorum this evening.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now recall it.

Mr. ALLISON. A great many Senators have engagements for this evening they made some time ago, and which we can not very well interfere with.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw the suggestion, Mr. President, and agree entirely with everything which the Senator from Iowa has said. However, I do insist that the Senate shall not only give the time necessary for the appropriation bills, either in the daytime or in the evening, but an additional time for the consideration of some general legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire as to occupying time enough to consider necessary bills that are likely to become laws at the present session, and that ought to become laws. I have no doubt there will be intervals when that can be done.

Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the five-minute rule may be applied to the pending bill, and that we begin voting upon all amendments at 1 o'clock, and dispose of the bill without further debate.

Mr. BATE. I suggest to the Senator that so far as this bill is concerned——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a statement? I would ask that aside from the time necessary for the appropriation bills the time be first of all given to the consideration of the bankruptcy bill and the pending amendments; that that bill, aside from appropriation bills, be given the right of way for consideration and voting.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to unite cordially in the request that a period be given for the consideration of the bankruptcy bill. I have letters and petitions——

Mr. ALLISON. I unite cordially also, but I can not allow that measure to interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. BATE. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I was not in the Chamber when an agreement was proposed about the five-minute rule. Is that to apply to the particular case now under consideration?

Mr. ALLISON. That applies to the Indian appropriation bill, which has now been under debate for a good many days.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. And the amendments.

Mr. BATE. And the amendments to the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; and all amendments.

Mr. CULLOM. To close at 1 o'clock.

Mr. BATE. I venture to say there is another amendment which we have not reached, which occupied more time at the last session than any other that was discussed. It might be that more than five minutes would be necessary for the speeches on that.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt that the amendment to which the Senator alludes is one with which the Senate is quite familiar, but a great many arguments for and against can be made in five or ten minutes. I hope that that amendment will not interfere with the general agreement which I think is imperatively necessary in order to conclude our business.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to make a single suggestion?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. If there can be unanimous consent to consider an involuntary bankruptcy bill, it can be passed at almost any time in ten minutes, but if the other question is to be discussed, it can not be passed at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. That is the reason why I hope there will be no complication as respects the particular business outside of appropriation bills that we shall consider.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I should like to make one remark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. VILAS. It is well known to the Senate that there is on each side of the Chamber an informal committee, known as "the steering committee," mainly governed by the Committee on Appropriations, which has laid out the work of this session and brought us into this predicament.

I should like further to remark also that yesterday was spent in discussing an amendment put on this appropriation bill utterly irrelevant to its nature, purely concerning an entirely different subject, and that to-day has been spent in resisting another amendment put on this appropriation bill by the Committee on Appropriations, and that to-morrow ought to be given up to resisting still another amendment which has not yet been discussed.

Mr. BATE. And that is perhaps the most important of all of them.

Mr. VILAS. Yes, perhaps the most important of all; and if the Committee on Appropriations wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to suppress its duty in the consideration of amendments which are proposed, the Committee on Appropriations ought to withdraw the amendments with which it loads down these many appropriation bills.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator what is the amendment which he thinks needs discussion to-morrow?

Mr. VILAS. I think the amendment now pending has not been disposed of.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; but the amendment which the Senator speaks of discussing to-morrow.

Mr. VILAS. To-morrow there are amendments relating to the Five Civilized Tribes of very great consequence.

I am unwilling to be an objector to arrangements for expediting the business of the Senate, but I want it understood where the difficulty lies. It ought to be known that the Senate is ready and willing to meet all questions which are put upon it, and that it comes from the Committee on Appropriations itself that these long-protracted discussions are necessary in order to pass the appropriation bills, because amendments are brought in here which are not properly relevant and germane to bills making appropriations for the conduct of the Government, but measures of general legislation, which can not be passed through the Senate without some proper consideration by the Senate. This day has not been wasted. It has been necessarily and properly applied to a debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me a single observation, which he will readily answer, is it not a fact that almost every moment of time of the debate upon this bill has been upon Senate amendments, and not five minutes of time upon the bill as it came from the other House?

Mr. VILAS. It has been almost entirely upon amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not accuse or excuse, nor do I say the time has been wasted by the Committee on Appropriations or by others. I only state now, leaving such criticism as may be made by the Senator from Wisconsin and others with respect to the Committee on Appropriations, passing that by for the moment, that whatever may have been done in the past, either by that committee or the Senate or anybody else connected with it, we have reached a point in the discussion of these questions when it is necessary for all of us, whether we are for or against a particular amendment, or believe or do not believe in a particular committee, to hasten the business by making as rapid progress as we can.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, can not the Committee on Appropriations relieve the situation by withdrawing their proposals for amendments of the character which we have been discussing during this day and which we are to discuss to-morrow, if they are to be insisted upon? If the Appropriations Committee will withdraw those extraordinary amendments to this bill, we can dispose of the bill in five minutes, probably.

Mr. HOAR. They have not any parliamentary power to do that. I hope the Senator will let this unanimous consent be given, because otherwise we are going to be in great confusion. The Committee on Appropriations have no parliamentary right to withdraw an amendment.

Mr. VILAS. But must we under all circumstances consent to the disposition of such an amendment as is to come before us to-morrow after this one is disposed of, and let it be rushed through on a five-minute debate, trampling down all the rules of the Senate and all the obligations of the Government? Yes; as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] suggests, violating the contracts which have been made with these Five Civilized Tribes. The most important amendment of all comes up to-morrow.

Now, I hope—I do not wish to disagree with this proposal or with any proposal which will expedite business—but I hope the proposal will be made with reference to the exigence upon the Senate, and that if this bill is to be insisted upon, and all its various amendments to be pressed, at least time enough will be given to-morrow to deal with the subject as it may deserve. I am willing to agree to what other Senators desire. I am not going to be singular in my objection; but if I am to be placed under duress by the condition of the public business, let us understand what the nature of that duress is and how it comes to reach that pass.

Mr. ALLISON. As to the particular amendment which the Senator from Wisconsin thinks should be discussed by and large, I certainly agree with him, and I shall be glad to have it so discussed. It seems to be an amendment in the nature of legislation, and if so, it is in violation of our rules. I take it that a point of order would lie against it. We were pressed as a Committee on Appropriations to insert those provisions—I do not wish to go into a discussion of them now—because there was such an emergency respecting the situation in the Indian Territory that some action was necessary.

Mr. BERRY. Give an additional hour or so on that amendment.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to admit now that the amendment in regard to the Five Civilized Tribes violates the rules of the Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not admit that. I say it is a question whether it does or not.

Mr. VEST. I deny it absolutely, and I stand here ready to meet the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] or any other Senator upon that issue.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I regard that amendment as an emergency amendment, put on the bill because it was an emergency amendment. Otherwise it would not appear here.

I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, if that amendment is considered to be of special importance, as respects its discussion I should be willing for one to allow an hour or an hour and a half for debate upon it, in order that the reasons for the amendment and those against it may be unfolded to the Senate. But that we shall spend to-morrow upon that amendment, important as it is, and involving as much as it does, to the exclusion of other considerations and other business, will be fatal to the business of the Senate. That is all I have to say. I merely wish for myself to note the situation of the public business, and it is for the Senate, not for me, to say what ought to be done.

Mr. STEWART. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa to renew his request that the debate on all other amendments shall be limited to five minutes, and that at 1 o'clock that amendment shall be taken up, and we shall have an hour on it, the voting to commence at 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I shall object to any arrangement being made to-night for voting upon this bill, or any part of it. I think if the Senator from Iowa, or the Senator in charge of the bill will take it up as soon after 11 o'clock to-morrow as he possibly can, and will not allow an hour or so to be taken up by the passage of special bills which Senators may desire to get up, and will exclude other business, after the debate has progressed upon the bill a little way, with a full attendance of Senators here, then I should be willing to assent to the agreement; but in justice to the Senators who are not here now, it seems to me it is best not to make an agreement at this time.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. There is a very important resolution reported this morning unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in reference to the imprisonment of an American citizen, which, it seems to me, ought to have the right of way over everything else, and that may take a little time to-morrow morning.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is for the very reason that I want to know what the policy of the Committee on Appropriations is to be to-morrow morning that I should not be willing to agree to vote at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. DANIEL. The resolution to which I refer is most important, and I should not be willing to yield that to anything else.

Mr. ALLISON. I give notice, if necessary, that after the routine business has been completed to-morrow morning it will be the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations, and I have no doubt my colleague on the committee in charge of this bill will move to proceed to its consideration—and inasmuch as there is objection made, and it is not probable that any resolution can be agreed upon to-night, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me, that I may make a report.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Montana will allow me, I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa to permit me to ask him, in order that we may know how to govern ourselves for to-morrow, whether he proposes that the Senate shall sit continuously to-morrow?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator desire to have a recess and an evening session, or does he intend a continuous session?

Mr. ALLISON. A continuous session, I think, will be most convenient to Senators until 10 or 11 o'clock.

Mr. BACON. I only asked the question in order that we may know how to make our arrangements before we come to the Chamber to-morrow.

RESERVOIR SITES.

Mr. CARTER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1984) to provide for the use and occupation of reservoir sites reserved, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It is a small bill, and I think will excite no discussion.

Mr. ALLISON. That is an important bill, and I renew my motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to hear the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. Has the bill been reported from a committee?

Mr. CARTER. It is reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know what that bill is, as it makes large reservations.

Mr. CARTER. It does not make any reservations. It allows the reservoir sites to be utilized by the States and citizens. It makes no reservations of any reservoir sites whatever. It merely allows reservoir sites to be set apart to be utilized by citizens of the States.

Mr. STEWART. There are some bills on that subject which are very sweeping.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House has passed the bill (S. 3307) declaring the Potomac Flats a public park, under the name of the Potomac Park.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 257) providing for printing the reports from diplomatic and consular officers of the United States on the passport regulations of foreign countries.

Mr. ALLISON. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 25, 1897, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 24, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on Senate bill 1832.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BABCOCK. I rise for the purpose of raising the question of consideration on this conference report. I would like to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The statement can be made only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BABCOCK. The conference report is privileged and can be called up at any time. I raise the question of consideration.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 42; so the House determined to consider the conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1832) entitled "An act to define the rights of purchasers under mortgages authorized by an act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, concerning the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In line 2 of said amendment numbered 1, and after the word "to" where it occurs the second time, insert the words "the United States;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the word "not" in line 31 of the bill, and in place of the language stricken out by said amendment insert the words:

"Except all debts, demands, and liabilities which were due or owing by the old company, which were contracted, accrued, or were incurred, or are due or owing for tickets and freight balances, or for wages, work, labor, materials, machinery, fixtures, and supplies of every kind and character, done, performed, or furnished in the repair, equipment, operation, or extension of said road, and its branches so purchased, and all liabilities incurred by said old company in the transportation of freight and passengers thereon, including damages for injuries to employees or other persons, and to property, and which debts, demands, and liabilities have accrued or upon which suit had been brought or was pending, or judgment rendered, within twelve months prior to the appointment of a receiver or receivers in the foreclosure proceeding, or since the appointment of any such receiver; but such liabilities shall not include any liabilities to other railroad companies except for tickets and freight balances."

Strike out the words "legally chargeable against said old corporation," in the amendment of House numbered 2; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 3, 4, and 5.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"Provided further, That in case any uncompleted contracts for the purchase of lands shall be pending at the time of such foreclosure sale, such new company shall, upon payment to it of any unpaid balance of purchase money for such land at the time provided in such contracts for the sale thereof, convey and release to the holders of such contracts all its title, interest, and estate in and to the land embraced in such contracts."

And after the word "company," in line 4 of said amendment numbered 6, insert the words "to any bona fide settler and occupant in a tract of 640 acres or less."

Also strike out from line 7 of said amendment numbered 6 the words "said contracts for the sale of lands," and in lieu thereof insert the words "any such contract."

Also after the word "of," in line 12 of said amendment, insert the word "any."

Also strike out from line 12 of said amendment the word "contracts" and insert in lieu thereof the word "contract;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 7.

H. HENRY POWERS,
GEO. P. HARRISON,
GROVE L. JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

DAVID B. HILL,
O. H. PLATT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

Statement to accompany the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate bill 1832, entitled "An act to define the rights of purchasers under mortgages authorized by an act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, concerning the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company."

The amendment of the House numbered 1 seeks to subject the new corporation to all the obligations and duties to the United States imposed upon the original company by the charter of 1866. Hence the words "the United States" are added to the amendment by the conference committee to make such meaning clear and certain.

The amendment of the House numbered 2, with respect to the liability of the purchasers for the unsecured debts of the old company, is enlarged to cover the instructions of the House to the conferees on January 29, 1897 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1378), and is in accord therewith.

The insertion in detail of all such debts, demands, and liabilities under such instructions renders ungrammatical and unnecessary the words "legally chargeable against said old corporation," and for this reason only they are stricken out.

The amendments of the House numbered 3, 4, and 5 are accepted by the Senate conferees.

The amendment of the House numbered 6 requires the new company to protect the land warranties and contracts of the old. It is not clear that the amendment applies to executory land contracts whereon the purchaser has made partial payments, and language has been added so providing in terms.

With respect to executed land contracts, the Senate conferees insisted that such liability should be applied to actual settlers and occupants purchasing in tracts of 640 acres or less, following legislative precedent in this regard, as illustrated by the general railroad land-grant forfeiture act of September 29, 1890, section 3 (26 Stat. L., 496), where the right is so protected to a maximum of 320 acres on payment to the United States of $1.25 per acre. Here the new company is required to recoup the purchaser for loss of title to the extent of 640 acres, but without any compensation therefor.

The amendment of the House numbered 7 is accepted by the Senate conferees.

H. HENRY POWERS,
GEO. P. HARRISON,
Conferees.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, this was a Senate bill which came over to the House, and on consideration in the House seven different amendments were proposed and adopted. To some of those amendments the committee having the bill in charge had grave and serious objections at the time they were proposed. One of them related to the land grant made to this company some years ago, the question of the validity of which was pending in the Supreme Court of the United States at the time this bill was under consideration in the House. It was thought by the committee that it was untimely and unwise for Congress to legislate upon a subject that was then pending in the courts, but the House deemed it otherwise, and insisted upon the adoption of the amendment which was proposed by my friend from Illinois [Mr. COOKE]. Since the consideration of this bill in the House and the adoption of that amendment, the Supreme Court has decided the case that was then pending, by which decision it is held that the forfeiture of these lands, as declared by Congress, was valid. Therefore it would seem that there would be no further necessity for this amendment in the bill, but when we came to examine the facts in the case in the Supreme Court it turned out to be a suit in favor of an individual, so that a judgment rendered in that case would not necessarily be an estoppel in other cases that might be pending. Accordingly, your committee have seen fit to recommend the retention of this amendment in the bill, so as to preclude the possibility of any further trouble on that score, and I assume that that will make the bill satisfactory to the gentleman who proposed the amendment.

Another amendment to which we had serious objection was the one numbered seven, which was proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], which required this new company, on the request of any State through which its line might run, to take out a State charter. Our friends upon the other side of the House seemed to have a notion that the General Government, in cases of this kind at least, had no power to grant charters. I thought differently. The committee thought differently. But, however that may be, in order to insure the passage of the bill and meet the objection of gentlemen founded upon that view, the amendment is retained, so I take it that gentlemen who have opposed the bill for that reason will have no further ground of complaint. Some other objectionable features were inserted in the bill which were objectionable to all of the House conferees, for I think I am authorized to say that none of us concurred in the wisdom of those amendments, but the House imposed upon us positive instructions and we could not do otherwise in the conference than carry out those instructions both in their spirit and in their letter. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] proposed an amendment which has been adopted by the conference committee, and I understand that it meets with acceptance, so that I do not know of a reason why any gentleman can have the slightest objection to the amended bill. And now, unless some gentleman desires to be heard, I will ask for the previous question.

Mr. McRAE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. McRAE. I think it is the amendment numbered 6 that you agreed to, with an amendment in the nature of a proviso.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. McRAE. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the words "not forfeited by the act of July 6, 1886," should be inserted between the words "lands" and "shall," where it refers to uncompleted contracts for the purchase of lands? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment proposed by the conference committee may be construed to have the effect of nullifying what is sought by the House amendment to the bill, and what has been emphatically declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company against Robert Mingus, the opinion in which was delivered a week ago last Monday. Our contention for ten years has been, and it is now supported by the decision of the Supreme Court, that the act of July 6, 1886, restored to the public domain all lands opposite the line of the road where it was not constructed at that time, and that being true, the settlers who are on any of these forfeited lands or those who may desire to enter under the public-land laws should take them free from any obligation they may have entered into with the railroad company; and it appears to me that if we do not affirmatively restrict these uncompleted contracts by proper language to lands earned prior to July 6, 1886, we may compel those settlers who been compelled to purchase their peace from the railroad company to comply with their contract as to future payments before they can get title. In other words, do we not legalize contracts of sale made by the railroad company for lands forfeited by the act of July 6, 1886, and which it has no title to?

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. The gentleman will perhaps remember the language of the amendment that I offered, which required this corporation to positively relinquish and quitclaim by deed, to be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, all such lands as had not been earned by building the road up to the date of the forfeiture act of July 6, 1886. Now, that is a condition precedent to their reorganization under this charter, and does it not cover all such minor questions as the one raised by the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. McRAE. I understand the amendment of the House fully. The same provision, substantially, was in the substitute that I proposed for this bill when it was first presented. To that amendment, with the condition which you and I have insisted from the start should be inserted in this bill, the conferees have attached a proviso that so far as the existing contracts for lands which have been sold are concerned, the settlers may be required to pay the railroad company the balance due it and then the company to make a deed. So that, while we pretend to the settlers that we are making this condition, we are, so far as concerns contracts which have been made, doing no such thing, but, on the contrary, ratifying the illegal contracts.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I ask the gentleman whether that could by any possibility apply to the unearned lands after they have been reconveyed and quitclaimed to the United States? Such reconveyance must now be made before this new charter becomes operative.

Mr. McRAE. If it is not intended by the conferees to apply to the forfeited lands, I suggest that they should withdraw this report and insert the words "not forfeited by the act of July 6, 1886." With those words added, no question could arise as to what we mean. If there is no purpose to let this new provision apply to unearned lands, then let us declare clearly upon the face of this act our intention.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I had not conceived it possible that if this amendment No. 5 were inserted in the charter there could be any possibility of any claim being made to them by the corporation after they had relinquished by deed all their right, title, and interest in and to the unearned lands. I had not supposed it possible under such circumstances that the railroad company could get the benefit of any such lands after it had conveyed its entire interest in them to the United States.

Mr. McRAE. That would be true if the condition stood without the additional language embraced in the proviso which the conferees have inserted, and it may be with it, but that is not certain. If the conferees do not mean by this proviso to nullify the effect of the condition imposed by the House by a strong vote, then it is due to themselves and the House that they should ask to withdraw the report, so as to insert the language I have suggested. With that language added there can be no question as to the effect of the act. We can not be too careful in dealing with this corporation.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. But, as I take it, all parts of an act must be construed, if it can be done, so as to be consistent.

Mr. McRAE. But lawmakers, when adopting legislation, should see to it, as far as possible, that they incorporate in the laws no inconsistent provisions to be construed by the courts. That is our duty. The subsequent duty of construing and reconciling inconsistent provisions belongs to the court, and in this way they make a great many of our laws mean what we did not intend.

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. I have not supposed that there was any such loophole as that whatever. I can not conceive of any such question arising as the matter now stands.

Mr. McRAE. I ask the Clerk to read the concluding language of the decision to which I have referred, so that the House may understand that the very contention which has been made by those of us who have sought to have this condition inserted in this bill has been emphatically and without reserve or qualification sustained by the Supreme Court.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon the whole it does not seem to us that Congress exceeded its powers in forfeiting this grant. The plaintiff company seems to have undertaken its great enterprise in building a transcontinental railroad without adequate appreciation of the difficulties to be surmounted, which finally caused a total suspension of its work; and when, in 1880, after the panic of 1873 had spent its force, it resumed operations, the time had already expired for the completion of the road, and it was only by the inaction or indulgence of Congress that it was permitted to proceed. So far as the road was built and accepted by the Government after that time, it was probably entitled to receive its appropriate land grant, but this was rather a matter of favor than of strict right. During this long period, from 1871 to 1880, it should, under its charter, have constructed at least 50 miles per year, and should have completed the whole road by July 1, 1878. But it did nothing. After this long inaction of nine years and its practical abandonment of the work, the company was not in a position to demand of the Government a strict and literal performance of its obligations when it had so completely failed to meet its own. While the reservation of some of these lands for the benefit of the Indian tribes might not have been consistent with its obligations to extinguish Indian titles, if the company had been prosecuting its work according to its contract, we do not think that it is entitled to complain that the Government did not deal with it precisely as if it lived up to its undertaking.

The judgment of the court below must therefore be affirmed.

Mr. McRAE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the conferees will consent to withdraw this report and incorporate in the bill the amendment which I have suggested. If that be not assented to, then I hope the House will reject the report, and then I shall ask that the conferees be instructed to insert, after the word "lands" and before the word "shall," in the amendment which they propose to the sixth amendment of the House, the words "not forfeited by the act of July 6, 1886;" so that the settlers and purchasers who have contracts with the railroad company for forfeited lands which, under the decision of the Supreme Court, the company had no right to sell will be freed from any such contract, instead of being required to pay the railroad company the contract price before they can get their title to public lands.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, it is quite apparent that the objection of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] is purely technical. The amendment which was proposed by the gentleman from Illinois requiring this railroad company, as a condition precedent to the right to reorganize, to convey back their entire title to the lands that were granted to them under the act of 1866 takes away from the company all title whatever in these unearned land grants.

Now, the object of the proviso which was put in here by the committee of conference was to cover the salvo that was left in the forfeiture act itself, which provided that it should not be operative to dispossess settlers who had made their purchases in good faith, but that such settlers should have the right to go on and perfect their titles. The proviso which the committee has inserted simply enables those purchasers to pay the balance of their unpaid purchase money to the company and take the lands. What more could be asked? The gentleman's proposed amendment is wholly unnecessary. The whole ground is covered by the legislation proposed in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, it was agreed to; there being on a division (called for by Mr. McRAE)—ayes 100, noes 24.

On motion of Mr. POWERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Accounts has a matter to present.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. TRACEY, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted a report; which was read, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred sundry resolutions, beg leave to report as follows:

Resolution No. 544, to pay William Richardson $178.27, being the difference between his salary as folder, at $840 per annum, and that of acting assistant foreman in the folding room, at $1,200 per annum, from September 4, 1896, to March 4, 1897, is disapproved.

Resolution No. 522, authorizing the Clerk of the House to pay Frank E. Wanser and John W. Herndon $300 each, for extra services rendered during the summer of 1896, is disapproved.

Resolution No. 453, directing the Clerk of the House to pay W. H. Grimshaw for services performed as messenger to the Committee on Ways and Means from June 12, 1896, at the rate of $60 per month, is disapproved.

Resolution No. 434, directing the Clerk of the House to pay to J. E. Winter for services performed as a folder under the Doorkeeper of the House from the 11th of June to the 11th day of December, 1896, for services in Clerk's document room during the recess of Congress has been amended so that compensation shall date from the 11th day of July, instead of the 11th day of June, 1896, at the rate of $75 per month, and in that form is approved.

Resolution No. 443, directing the Clerk of the House to pay J. C. Hiatt for three months' services performed under the Clerk of the House in the Clerk's document room during the recess of Congress, at the rate of $75 per month, is approved.

The employment of Messrs. Winter and Hiatt was made necessary by the rapid accumulation of documents specially bound for members of Congress. No other provision had been made for it, and the services of these men were indispensable.

Resolution No. 548, for the preparation, printing, and binding of 500 copies of the Digest of Contested Election Cases in the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses has been amended so as to read, "1,000 copies of the Digest of Contested Election Cases," instead of "500 copies;" and in that form is approved.

The committee, in conclusion, recommended the adoption of the resolutions accompanying the report.

The first resolution was read, as follows:

(434) Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to J. E. Winter the sum of $375, for services performed as a folder under the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives from the 11th of July to the 11th day of December, 1896, both days inclusive, for services in Clerk's document room during the recess of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the first resolution.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is almost impossible to determine exactly the status of that report. Approvals and disapprovals are intermixed.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions in the cases where approval is given are presented to the House separately. The resolution that has just been read is what the House passes upon. That is approved by the committee, and they report the resolution, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DOCKERY. But, Mr. Speaker, some other approvals were noted in the report.

The SPEAKER. Those will be acted upon in resolutions which will be submitted separately to the House.

The first resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk read the second resolution, as follows:

(443) Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay J. C. Hiatt the sum of $225 for three months' services performed under the Clerk of the House between August 1, 1896, and December 1, 1896, in the Clerk's document room, during the recess of Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next resolution, as follows:

(548) Resolved, That there be printed and bound for the use of the House 1,000 copies of the Digest of Contested-Election Cases in the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses, together with an index of the same, to be prepared by Henry C. Morton and Charles D. Rooney, clerks to the Committees of Elections numbered 2 and 3, respectively, during the Fifty-fourth Congress, for which, and for the necessary preparation and superintendence thereof, there shall be paid said persons, by the Clerk of the House, out of the contingent fund, the sum of $2,500; said sum to be paid when the manuscript of the work shall have been delivered to the Public Printer.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propose an amendment to this resolution.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 4, after the words "to be prepared by," insert "William A. Martin;" and in line 6, after the word "numbered," insert "one."

Mr. McMILLIN. How did this get before the House?

The SPEAKER. On a report from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. TRACEY. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that inasmuch as that amendment simply includes the clerk of the other Committee on Elections, it is accepted by the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. What effect does it have on the amount?

Mr. TRACEY. None at all. It does not change the amount.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask consent to have the resolution read again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read the resolution, if there be no objection.

The resolution and amendment were again read.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask for the reading of the report that accompanies this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The report has been read.

Mr. McMILLIN. It was read on the consideration of the former resolution.

The SPEAKER. It was read in full.

Mr. McMILLIN. The report was on all the matters embraced in the resolutions?

The SPEAKER. All the matters.

Mr. McMILLIN. We should like to have a statement with reference to the necessity for this printing and compilation.

Mr. TRACEY. I desire to say with reference to this matter that the committee made a somewhat exhaustive investigation of the precedents, and found that in prior Congresses the smallest amount that has been heretofore paid for the compilation and digesting and indexing of these cases was $1,000, when there were but six cases to file, index, and digest, and the conclusion of the committee, therefore, was that the amount was reasonable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Are not these men now already getting $2,000 per annum apiece from the Government?

Mr. TRACEY. These clerks of the Elections Committees are named in the resolution because of their extreme familiarity with the cases, and their ability, therefore, to do the work better than it could be done by some other person.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to ask the gentleman if they have not leisure to do this work?

Mr. TRACEY. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] for a further statement in regard to this matter.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to have a motion pending to strike out "$2,500" and to make it $100.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRACEY. I do not yield for an amendment. I want to yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. STEELE. I suppose opportunity will be given to offer amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House, I would like briefly to present the merits of this resolution. As is generally known, it has been the custom from time immemorial to digest the contested-election cases decided by the House. That work has generally been let to the clerks of the Elections Committee, where they were competent to perform the duty. There were in the Forty-fifth Congress 22 cases in the digest; in the Forty-seventh Congress 20 cases; in the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth Congresses 28 cases, and in the Fifty-first Congress 17 cases. In the last Congress there were, I think, 6 cases. In the present Congress there have been 35 cases in all decided. This resolution calls for the digesting of the five or six cases in the preceding Congress and the 35 cases in this Congress, making a total of over 40 cases.

Mr. McMILLIN. How many of these cases were not really contested?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I can speak more accurately as to the cases presented to the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman; and I think there was but one.

Mr. MOODY. And one in Committee No. 1.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Nearly all of these cases were carefully considered by the various committees, and lengthy and elaborate reports were made. Many of them involved very important questions of law touching the construction to be placed, in some instances, upon the Australian ballot system which has been, as is generally known, recently introduced into this country. Now, the present committees have been obliged to reach their conclusions without having before them the decisions which were made in the last Congress. Inasmuch, however, as there were not a great many of these cases, it has not been a serious disadvantage; but there are a large number of contested-election cases to be considered in the next Congress, and I do not see how it will be possible for the members of the Elections Committees of that Congress to discharge their duty properly unless they have before them the latest precedents well digested—that is, the thirty-five cases decided by the present Congress. The committees of this House have discharged their proper duties and disposed of all the cases that were referred to them.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. They feel that they would fail to discharge their duty if they did not make an effort to have these cases digested for the benefit of the Committees on Elections in the next Congress. This duty, under this resolution, is placed in the hands of persons who will undertake it at once, and the digest will be completed and ready for the use of the Committees on Elections at the first regular session of the next Congress; as it is apprehended but very few election cases will be decided at the approaching special session.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I desire to say that the reason it is necessary to include the cases decided in the Fifty-third Congress is that, although a resolution was passed, the clerk did not perform the duty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I think the gentleman is right about that. The gentleman from New York desires to ask me a question.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman what will be the total expense?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The total expense will be the amount named in the resolution, and then the cost of printing.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. That is $2,500?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Are these men to be paid $2,500 for merely preparing the headnotes of these cases?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman will understand that this digest, unless it is well prepared, will not be worth the paper it is written on—not worth a dollar.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Does the gentleman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana (continuing). But if it is well prepared, so that it will be useful to a lawyer, if done in a lawyer-like manner, it is amply worth the amount stated in the resolution to prepare it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York indicated a desire to ask another question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman will pardon me. These cases, when digested, will make a very large volume. If the digesting is deferred until the next Congress, that Congress will not only lose, in the consideration of its contested-election cases, the benefits of the precedents established by this Congress, but when it is attempted to make a digest for the future of the cases decided in this Congress and the next Congress, there will be so many of the cases that it will take two volumes.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one more question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. You mean by the use of the word "digest" preparing headnotes, do you not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The work has been called "digesting." In point of fact, however, the work is very similar in its nature to the reporting of cases as done by the various reporters of the supreme courts of the States.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The cases are arranged in proper order, and there is a syllabus prepared to each case; and all the authorities are digested and arranged under a proper alphabetical designation at the end of the book, the same as is done with respect to the reports of the various States. There is also, of course, a list of the cases to facilitate reference.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. My impression was that the work would be such as the gentleman states. Now, does he mean to say that any of our State reporters are paid at any such rate as that—$2,500 for forty headnotes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not know the rate at which the various State reporters are paid, but I do know that it requires peculiar legal knowledge and skill to be able to take up one of these cases and digest it properly, extracting the heart of the controversy and putting it properly in the form of an instructive syllabus, and then making a proper digest of it at the end of the volume. And I know more than this. I know that the clerk of the Committee on Elections No. 2 is a gentleman who has read law thoroughly, who has been associated with lawyers all his life, who has intelligently followed the work of the committee, and who is thoroughly qualified to make a good lawyer-like digest.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. These men who are to prepare this digest are very familiar with these cases, are they not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Each gentleman, I presume, is familiar with the cases decided by his committee, but none of them is familiar with the cases that were decided in the last Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. That is, they are not familiar with the five cases that were decided in the last Congress, but they are familiar with the thirty-four cases that have been decided in the present Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. They are familiar with them in the sense that they know the cases were decided by the committee and had some conception of the questions involved at the time; but the gentleman will bear me out in saying that a general familiarity with a number of long decisions is not sufficient to enable a man to sit down and compile a proper digest in a few moments. The gentleman is too good a lawyer not to know that it requires legal training to be able to take up a case, to go over it in detail, to ascertain what was the actual point of the controversy decided, and to make such a syllabus as will present the matter fairly to the mind of the average lawyer. To do that a man must have the legal training which will enable him to draw nice distinctions and discriminations, and to comprehend that which is pertinent and material.

Mr. STEELE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from New York interminably. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Now, if these men are as familiar with the cases and as competent as the gentleman states, they must know what was decided in each particular case, and they doubtless have now prepared, either on paper or in their minds, a statement of the principles involved in each case, so that in a few minutes they could reduce it to writing. Now, that being so, why throw away $2,500 of the public money?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if the acquisition of the law is as easy a matter as the gentleman seems to think, then we all ought to engage in its practice. If the gentleman is right, it requires no special preparation or training.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I mean that if a man has been familiar with a case he can determine at once the principle or principles involved in the decision of that case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Well, a practicing lawyer may have read carefully in time past a number of cases, yet if there is no syllabus of them it will require intelligent care and painstaking thought on his part to get at the heart of each decision and put it into the form of an accurate and comprehensive digest.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Are these clerks lawyers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Speaking for the Committee on Elections No. 2, I can say that the clerk of the committee is a gentleman who has read law quite thoroughly and I think has practiced some, and he is well equipped with information and qualified by training to make a good digest. I am informed that the clerk of the Committee on Elections No. 3 has taken a thorough course in law and is also well equipped for this work.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Now, is not this in reality a partisan matter?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. How in the world did the gentleman ever get such an idea as that into his head? Certainly not. [Laughter.] This is a bona fide effort on the part of the chairmen of the several Elections Committees to do what they conceive it to be their duty to do in the closing hours of this session, to have prepared a digest of these election cases in a proper and lawyer-like manner, to the end that the next Congress, in the disposition of the many cases that will come before it, may have the advantage of these precedents to guide it.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I will deal with the gentleman more courteously than he dealt with me the other day; I will gladly yield to him.

Mr. PAYNE. That is only on a par with the usual courtesy of the gentleman from Indiana. I rise to ask the gentleman a pertinent question with reference to this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Before the gentleman asks his question, however——

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman, who is chairman of one of these Election Committees, how far the committee or the House are bound, or how far the House has bound itself, in deciding election cases during this Congress, by precedents established by other Congresses? In other words, my question is whether each Congress does not decide these cases according to its own sweet will, and according to its own interpretation of the clause of the Constitution which makes each House the judge of the qualification and election of its own members.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am quite a little surprised at hearing a question like that from a gentleman who is so good a lawyer as the gentleman from New York. I take it that this House, in deciding election cases, is not governed entirely by its own sweet will, but acts in conformity to the precedents set by prior Congresses, and, in view of the fact that a great many cases have been reported to this House by the Committees on Elections without regard to party lines and have been decided by the House in a nonpartisan and judicial spirit, my answer to his question is that there is a growing disposition in the American House of Representatives to be bound by just precedents. I hope that the House will continue to improve in this respect in the future.

Mr. PAYNE. To be bound by the precedents of former Congresses?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. To be bound by the just precedents of former Congresses. And I say to the gentleman further that so far as the work of the Committee on Elections No. 2 is concerned, I know that the committee has been greatly aided in its deliberations by precedents set in former Congresses.

Mr. PAYNE. One more question, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman further.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman why, as the Fifty-third Congress did not think it worth while to prepare a digest of their election cases, we should prepare a digest of those cases now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Because, as we all admit, this is the best Congress that ever assembled; and for the further reason that in the Fifty-third Congress there were only five or six contested-election cases decided. Here are thirty-four contested-election cases. The gentleman, being a lawyer, must know that a lawyer can not work without the tools of his trade any more than a carpenter can.

Mr. PAYNE. But if that Congress or the majority of that Congress did not think it worth while to put into permanent and accessible form the decisions they had made, why should we go into that work?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The mere fact that a particular Congress failed to put its election cases into the form of a digest is not conclusive evidence that it did not think it necessary that it should be done at some time. It has been customary, as my friend will find upon an examination of the facts, to allow a couple of Congresses to run before a digest is ordered, particularly where but few cases have been decided. It is desirable that the cases should be allowed to accumulate until there are enough to make one good-sized volume. The cases now decided, but not yet digested, will make a very large-sized book, as I have already stated.

Mr. COX. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I had no idea of being catechised either so generally or so severely. But let the gentleman proceed with his question.

Mr. COX. As I understand, the proposition is to pay these clerks of committees a certain amount of money to make this digest, or whatever you may call it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Are they not annual clerks, receiving salaries of $2,000 each?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. They are annual clerks, receiving that salary.

Mr. COX. One more question. After Congress adjourns, what duties have these clerks to perform, as annual clerks, receiving a salary of $2,000 a year, except to do such work as the preparation of this digest?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, these are annual clerks; but it is no part of their duty to prepare a digest. It never has been so considered. Soon after Congress adjourns, their salaries will cease. They are not paid to make digests; that is not a part of their duty. There has never been a time in the history of Congress when a clerk has been asked to make a digest simply because he was receiving a salary as clerk. This work is entirely outside of any work properly performed by a clerk. I want to get that idea into the minds of members of the House—that it has never been considered part of a clerk's duty to make a digest unless he is specially compensated for it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will gladly yield to any gentleman who desires to ask any question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to ask whether these clerks have the time during vacation to prepare these digests?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suppose that after their terms have expired and after their salaries as committee clerks have ceased, they have leisure time; but that time belongs to themselves—not to the Committees on Elections or to this House.

I repeat, there has never been an instance in the history of Congress in which anybody has claimed that it was a part of the duty of clerks to prepare digests. And it is a fact also that many a clerk to the Committees on Elections has lacked the legal capacity to make a good digest.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Would it not be a wiser expenditure of public money to buy some elementary book on election law and send a copy of it to each member of the House and the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman, being a lawyer, and knowing all law, will understand that there is no very recent edition of any work on elections. Paine and McCrary are the two standard books; and as to these, I believe, the editions are quite old. These cases which it is now sought to digest are cases which have been decided by the present Congress. Now, the gentleman may be ashamed of the work of the House or of its committees, and may not want to see the work of the committees in print; but I take some pride in these cases, because I undertake to say there never has been a Congress in which contested-election cases were to the same extent as in the present Congress decided on their merits and without the influence of partisan feeling. I confess that I am surprised that when we are asking the passage of a resolution which proposes at so small an expenditure to preserve these precedents for the use of future Congresses, gentlemen who have voted vast appropriations without any sign of discontent should now be disposed to quibble on a matter involving so insignificant a sum as this.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What is to be the title of the book? Johnson's Digest?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman, I suppose, aims to be serious. He amuses the House most when he is in a serious mood. I wish he possessed the capacity to grasp the matter involved. As a lawyer he should know that it is absolutely necessary that a man should have the tools of his profession in order to properly practice it. I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Indiana seems to be thoroughly familiar with this whole matter, and I wish to ask him whether it is usual for the Committee on Accounts to report resolutions of this character?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman, I will say that I do not know whether it is usual for the Committee on Accounts to report such resolutions or not, but I deemed that it was the appropriate committee, and I took the advice of those at the desk, who were better posted in reference to such matters than I, when the reference was made. There has been no disposition to do anything but what was right in the matter. The purpose has been to present it fairly to the House, because the resolution is a meritorious one, whatever may be the action of this body.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Indiana will excuse me further——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. The purpose of the resolution seems to be to provide compensation for the work of digesting these election cases. So far as that is concerned, I can conceive that it is quite competent for the resolution to come from the Committee on Accounts. But the resolution also provides for the printing of this digest after it has been prepared. Now, so far as the Committee on Printing are concerned, in each case of this character that committee are required to report to the House the cost of the proposed printing. I have not heard in this instance any estimate from the Public Printer of the cost of this work, but only of the expense of making the digest.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is the gentleman asking me a question?

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman what further expense will be involved in the printing of this digest after these clerks have been paid for the work of preparing that document?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what will be the expense of printing the document.

Mr. DANIELS. It will be impossible to tell until the manuscript is prepared.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It is impossible to tell. It will depend upon the size of the document. It will be a large document. There are many pages of the reports that will have to be published. There are also minority reports made which will have to be included. The gentleman from New York speaks as if it is an easy matter to make a good digest, as if a man can write a digest in five minutes' time, without any reflection; but the truth is, that the work is a very onerous one, and that there are voluminous reports which must be examined. I know that the work is an absolute necessity, and that I would not dream of serving on the Committee on Elections in the next Congress, nor do I believe any lawyer in this House would do so, unless he knew he was to have the precedents to guide his action. Knowing that it is a necessity, if the House sees fit to adopt this resolution, I apprehend that the printing will follow in logical sequence.

Mr. PERKINS. I simply desire to add, Mr. Speaker, that I have no sensitiveness whatever in the matter of this report coming from the Committee on Accounts instead of the Committee on Printing, for if any committee is disposed to take off from the hands of the Committee on Printing any of its work, that is all very well. But in every instance where the Committee on Printing makes a report, it is required to make an estimate of the cost; and if other committees are going to enter upon this work, I desire that they shall be held to the same restriction as the Committee on Printing. I will say to the gentleman that that is the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to say to the gentleman that this resolution simply provides for the digesting, and does not provide for the printing, and I suppose that is the reason why the Committee on Accounts neglected to make a statement of the expense of the printing. The cost of printing will have to be attended to afterwards.

It is the earnest desire of the Committees on Elections that this resolution be passed, so that the clerks may get to work as soon as they can and get their manuscript ready for the Printer, in order that the whole book may be completed and be on the shelves of the Committees on Elections in time for the next regular session of Congress. It is apprehended that there will be but very few, if any, of these cases decided at the special session. Members know how that is.

Mr. PERKINS. I understood that this resolution also provided for the printing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It does not, as I remember it; but if it passes I shall take steps to supplement it with a provision for the printing, so that the House at the regular session may have the benefit of these decisions.

Mr. DANIELS. This resolution does provide for sending the manuscript to the Printer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It provides for sending the manuscript to the Public Printer.

Mr. RAY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, which I think is a practical one, or I should not ask it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. In making your report on a case, the Committee on Elections, of course, embrace therein a brief statement of the questions involved, and of what your opinions are, in each case that comes to the House. Now, if the House supports the findings of the majority of the committee, why would not a mere reprint of the reports of the committees, with a statement of the vote of the House on the questions submitted, constitute an ample, sufficient, and intelligent digest of all these cases?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am going to answer the gentleman's question by asking him one. I believe there is pretty good authority for that. What is the use of printing the syllabus of a law case? Why not let the lawyer read through the entire decision and find out what it was that the court decided? Of course there must be a syllabus and digest in order to economize time and labor.

Mr. RAY. That is all true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Upon the theory that "art is long and time is fleeting."

Mr. RAY. That is all true; but let me suggest to the gentleman that in these law cases the reports go all over the country and into the hands of thousands of lawyers, and it is much more important that you have a brief synopsis of each case than it is here in the House, I think. Now, of course, if it is regarded as absolutely essential to have this brief statement, it seems to me that it could be made up from the reports themselves, very briefly, with very little labor and at very little expense.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Well, the gentleman, I fear, like the gentleman from New York, entertains an idea that I apprehend is not generally entertained by lawyers, and that is that legal attainment is a mere matter of moonshine, very easily acquired. If so, I submit that the practice of the profession ought to be turned over to the butchers and the bakers, and that lawyers should get out of the legal arena altogether.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman what is the largest amount that has heretofore been paid by the House for this service?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I will answer the gentleman by saying I do not know. I simply know that the amount in the Fifty-third Congress, when there were only six cases, was $1,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. Another question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is the gentleman satisfied with the wording of this resolution? There is a section of the statute prohibiting two salaries being paid to one person. Do I understand these gentlemen are already on the annual rolls and receiving salaries?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman will understand that this work is to be performed outside of the work of the clerks as annual clerks.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman thinks that the statute would not apply?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. This is the customary resolution adopted in such cases by the House when the committee clerks have been appointed to do the work. I believe it will answer.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I would like to know if the opponents of this resolution can get the floor except by asking a question of the gentleman from Indiana?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has how much time yielded to him by the gentleman from Missouri in charge of the resolution?

Mr. TRACEY. I yielded the time necessary to make his statement. A great deal more time has been consumed in the asking of questions than was expected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for the extended remarks that I have been obliged to make in order to treat gentlemen with courtesy.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is there any way by which anybody opposed to the resolution can be heard?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen opposed to the measure can be heard by time being yielded to them by the gentleman from Missouri. If he does not yield them some time, then the other side will be recognized by the Chair. At any time the gentleman from Missouri can move the previous question, and then it will be for the House to decide.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I desire to add a few remarks.

Mr. MILES. I desire to ask the gentleman whether all these clerks are lawyers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I can only speak for the clerks of Committees Nos. 2 and 3. They have both read law. I have stated their qualifications. I know nothing about the qualifications of the clerk of Committee No. 1, whose name is moved as an amendment; I do not know anything about that gentleman's qualifications.

Mr. MILES. I am told that one of them at least is not a lawyer. I would like to ask the gentleman if he candidly thinks—and I believe he has stated that it requires a professional man—that a man who is not a lawyer will be of any service?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I think a man should have read and should understand the general principles of law before he can make a proper digest. We have two clerks possessed of this qualification; and if I did not think they were possessed of it, I would not for a minute recommend their assignment to this duty, because I know that a digest would be worthless unless properly prepared.

Mr. MILES. As I understand, the gentleman does not approve of the amendment to his proposition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not know anything about the qualifications of the gentleman named in the amendment. The gentleman from Tennessee desires to ask me a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the gentleman to state——

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe the matter is fully understood by the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I think the gentleman from Tennessee should be recognized to ask a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the gentleman from Indiana to say that this resolution did not provide for the printing of this digest?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It does not, as I remember it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does provide on the face of it that the digest shall be printed. The resolution infers the printing. I thought the gentleman was mistaken when he said it did not provide for the printing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I thought it did not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am very glad it does. It is just as important to print as to prepare a digest. I simply want a word or two more.

Mr. TRACEY. It is clear——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to suggest one thing more. I hope the House understands that these contested-election cases have been digested from time immemorial. This resolution is simply designed to continue a publication which has prevailed from the organization of the Government to this time. The Committees on Elections have tried to do their duty to this House faithfully, and I know that they have in many cases been commended by gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber for the fairness with which they have acted. They have not asked anything wrong. They are not now asking anything wrong. As I have said before, they feel that it is their duty to see that these decisions are preserved and embodied in the form of a digest. They feel that in attempting this they are but discharging a plain duty which they owe to the Congress that is so soon to convene as well as to all future Congresses. The lack of such a digest will be a serious impediment in the way of the Committee on Elections of the Fifty-fifth Congress in the discharge of the laborious duties which will devolve upon it. The question is for the House to determine. It can vote down the pending resolution if it desires. I have done my duty, and I believe the other gentlemen concerned feel that they have done their duty in the premises in presenting the matter to the House.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS].

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the objection which has been made that the secretary of Committee on Elections No. 1 is not a lawyer, I would say that it is absolutely essential that each one of these secretaries of the committees on elections shall be engaged in this work, for the reason that neither one of them knows what was done by the committee of which he was not the secretary or clerk. Each is familiar with the work of his own committee, and can go on and make a statement of cases with which the others are unfamiliar, and unless each of these secretaries is employed and unless they all cooperate, the work, if done at all, must be imperfectly and insufficiently done.

As to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that a standard work might be published and circulated among members for the sum of money that it is proposed to be paid for this digest, I would say that no work of standard authority coming down to the present time—even if such a work exists—can be purchased and paid for and distributed among the members of the House at so cheap a price as that which is specified in this resolution for preparing this work. In other words, it would cost more to purchase a standard work coming down to the present time, if any such could be found, than it is necessary to appropriate for carrying out the plan of the committee, and the work can not be properly and competently done unless it is done with the cooperation of all of these persons, each one bringing to bear upon the subject the separate and independent knowledge which he has of the proceedings that have taken place before the committee of which he was clerk or secretary and consummated by the House.

Mr. POWERS. If it be true that it is necessary to have the secretary of each Elections Committee engaged in this work so as to properly set forth the work of that committee, how can any of these secretaries report intelligently on the work of the Fifty-third Congress?

Mr. DANIELS. They will be obliged to take up the records of the Fifty-third Congress and study them and make out the digest from those records and report as best they may. The number of cases decided in that Congress was small and the cases were comparatively simple, while in this Congress there has been a large number of cases, many of them extremely complicated, and involving important principles which can not fail to be instructive and useful in the investigation of election cases hereafter. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PAYNE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] to yield me a few minutes.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe the House is now in full possession of the merits of this question.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman propose to refuse to yield to anybody except those who are in entire sympathy with the resolution as it stands?

Mr. TRACEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this resolution ought to pass in its present shape. I do not believe there is any reason or excuse for paying these men $2,500 to prepare this digest. I understand that the amount usually paid in previous Congresses for such work has been about $1,000, and I do not know why we should go beyond that amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman——

Mr. PAYNE. Do not interrupt me, please. I have only two minutes. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, why we should go further to look for more business for these gentlemen by setting them to prepare a digest of the cases decided in the Fifty-third Congress, if that Congress did not have confidence enough in its own decisions to digest them. I believe that the resolution ought to be amended so as to confine the work to a digest of the decisions of this Congress, and that if we give these men $500 apiece for it we shall be giving them more than is ample for the work to be done. I want to make the further suggestion that these gentlemen are to hold their offices until their successors are appointed, which may not be until next fall (though possibly it may be done at the next session), and if the compensation which they will receive during the vacation, in addition to the $500 which I propose to allow them, is found to be insufficient, then the next Congress can increase it. It is proposed to continue them in office, as I have stated, and if they are going to prepare this digest I do not think they should be allowed for that work more than has usually been allowed for such work in previous Congresses; and if it is in order I will move an amendment limiting this amount to $1,500 and confining the work to a digest of the decisions of election cases in this Congress.

Mr. TRACEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL].

Mr. PAYNE. Is my amendment in order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not in order without the consent of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman offered the amendment in his own time it would be in order, the previous question having been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that when a gentleman yields the floor under such circumstances, retaining control of it, an amendment can not be offered without his consent, because he has a right to test the will of the House by moving the previous question free from the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then the only way will be to vote down the demand for the previous question in order to reach the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The proper way is to vote it down if the House desires to consider the amendment.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, with regard to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that we should not prepare a digest of the cases in the Fifty-third Congress because the House of Representatives of that Congress did not have enough confidence in the wisdom of its decisions to provide for that work, I would say that there were in that Congress a number of very valuable minority reports in which I have a great deal of confidence, and I think it would be a wise and profitable thing to have those reports digested.

I wish to say, however, seriously, that it seems to me, in order to complete this work and bring it up to date, the decisions of the Fifty-third Congress should be digested. Some of them very probably will stand as legal curiosities; but at the same time we should keep up the records, so that future committees may be able readily to find out precisely what has been done in previous Congresses.

I remember that during that Congress the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], who is a very safe man to follow upon these matters, in speaking upon a resolution providing for digesting the cases in the previous Congress, the Fifty-second, said that it was a usual thing, and that a thousand dollars was a reasonable sum for the work proposed. In that instance the cases were those of only one Congress. I understand that this resolution provides for digesting the reports and decisions of the Fifty-third Congress and also those of the Fifty-fourth. So that the men who will do this work will really receive less, according to the amount of work they will actually perform, than has been allowed to clerks of previous committees.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a burning question; but the three chairmen of the Committees on Elections——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] has expired.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I should like to occupy a minute or two more.

Mr. TRACEY. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. As I was about to say, the three chairmen of the Committees on Elections agree that it is a wise thing to have these reports digested. It is not an easy matter to perform duty as a member of the Committee on Elections. We have in each case a great mass of testimony; we have very large briefs; and if you impose upon the members of that committee the additional duty of wading through the text of all the reports of previous Congresses, you increase largely the work imposed upon them.

The sum proposed to be allowed in this case is practically the same amount which we allow to a party in an election contest for his expenses.

Mr. MOODY. I understand that my colleague does not oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] to provide for a third clerk.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I do not oppose that amendment. I believe it is entirely proper. I think the sum proposed to be allowed here is reasonable, and that the work should be done.

Mr. TRACEY. Inasmuch as this day was set apart some time ago for the consideration of District business and as, evidently, if this discussion is to continue, it will take up the afternoon, thereby depriving the District Committee of the time allotted to it, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw this resolution from further consideration at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I object. Let us dispose of this matter now. If the House desires to put the committees of this House in the position of not having any digest of election cases, let us know it.

Mr. TRACEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question.

Mr. PERKINS. There is one matter I want to suggest——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] has moved the previous question.

The question being taken, the previous question was not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to move an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$2,500," in line 11, and insert "$1,500."

Mr. HENDERSON. That is right.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield to the gentleman from California. How much time does he desire?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I should like to occupy fifteen or twenty minutes. But I believe I was recognized by the Chair. Mr. Speaker, was I not recognized?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] desired simply to offer an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. And then you recognized me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, after the amendment was read, recognized the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir; of course.

Mr. PERKINS. Before action is taken on this resolution, I want to suggest, in the absence of any estimate of the Public Printer as to the cost of this work, that if it should be developed that the cost will be more than $500, the Public Printer, under the law, would not be authorized to do the work, and therefore the expense of making this digest would go for naught.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. What is to prevent the House from authorizing the Public Printer to do this work?

Mr. PERKINS. We can not by a simple resolution of the House authorize a printing expenditure of more than $500.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. How does the gentleman know that the Senate would not concur in authorizing the printing?

Mr. PERKINS. But they could not under this resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those unfortunate individuals described by the gentleman from Indiana, my namesake. I have been voting for appropriations of millions of dollars, and they have not scratched my throat in the slightest or interfered with my sleep; but I have struck something now that is a little too tough even for me to vote for; and when an appropriation is a little too tough for a California member to vote for, it ought to be too tough for anybody in these United States to vote for. I am opposed to this, whether it is $1,500 or $2,500. I am opposed to it because I believe it to be an entirely and absolutely unnecessary appropriation.

Since I have been a member of this House I have noticed with care the decisions rendered by the Elections Committees, and I have noticed with care the action of the House thereon. I must say that I agree entirely with the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in his question to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], namely, that the House always decides according to its own free will and does not pay any attention to the precedents of other Congresses. That is one reason why I am opposed to this resolution. It is absolutely unnecessary.

This is entirely different from the decisions of a supreme court. I am an humble member of the legal profession. I know just enough law to get other people into trouble, and that is about all. [Laughter.] But I know that a court is expected to follow the rule of stare decisis; and when you find a decision in the one hundredth volume of the reports of any State it is expected that the court, when it renders a decision to be printed in the one hundred and tenth volume, will follow the former decisions.

But this House is entirely different. It votes just as it pleases. It does not pay as much attention to the report of a committee as it ought to sometimes. Why, I know this House voted down a report of a committee of which I was a member, and if any House can do that, it can do anything in an election case. [Laughter.] Now, having done it in that case, they do it in other cases. I remember a short time ago, when we had a report from a majority of one of the Elections Committees, in the case of Hopkins vs. Kendall, a minority of only two members succeeded in convincing the majority of the House that they were right, and their views were accepted. When you come to digest that case, which will be digested, the majority report or the minority report? Which will be accepted as law, the majority report, the minority report, or the vote of the House?

I remember the decision in a contested-election case from the State of South Carolina, where this House oscillated from one side to the other, and voted one way one time and another way another time, and finally by unanimous consent it agreed to vote upon something that neither the Democrats nor the Republicans wanted. What is to govern there in making the digest?

It seems to me that the real ground, the one that impresses me to vote against this appropriation, is that this is so unnecessary. What is the use of doing anything that does not do any good? What is the use of doing anything that will not govern us? What is the use of citing authorities in a case, when the court that you are citing authorities to says that it will not pay any attention to the authorities cited? Suppose we had cited in the Fifty-fourth Congress a decision of the Fifty-third Congress in an election case? I can well imagine hearing in that event some of my Republican friends saying "That was a Democratic decision, and we are not bound by it."

Why, I have heard talk here about a Democratic civil-service law, and it is said we should pay no attention to it because it was a Democratic civil-service law. It seems to me that if we are going to have any digest of decisions we want to have those decisions digested that will govern the House. Is there any man here outside of the chairmen of these elections committees who will say that the decision of a former Congress will be binding upon this Congress or any other? I ask any of these gentlemen who are chairmen of these Elections Committees, Is there any law that makes the decision of one Congress binding upon another Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. A decision ought always to be binding where it is founded in reason and common sense, and the members of the legal profession are always glad to avail themselves of such a decision as a guide to direct them to a correct conclusion.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I thank the gentleman for his answer. It is as plain as mud, and therefore I do not understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will not blame me for his lack of understanding.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, certainly not. God Almighty is to blame for that, not you. [Laughter.] The reason why I can not understand it is, I suppose, because my name is JOHNSON, and therefore there was "too much Johnson" in the question and the answer. [Laughter.]

Now I will repeat the question that I asked.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Does the gentleman spell his name with a "t"?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, no; I am a poor man, like yourself. [Laughter.] Now, I will ask the question again: Is there any law that makes the decision of one Congress in an election case binding upon another Congress in an election case? If the gentleman can cite me to it, I will withdraw any opposition that I have to this resolution, and will unite with him in voting $2,500 to three men for doing work that would be dearly paid for if they were paid $300. I do not hear any answer to my question.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I would ask my friend, Mr. Speaker, since he is a lawyer, whether he knows of any law which makes the decision of a court binding upon its successor or upon any other court?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, yes.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Then the gentleman knows more law than most lawyers.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Well, that would not be anything surprising, and I might not know very much law then. [Laughter.] Now, I submit that the answer made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], perhaps the sharpest and most acute member of the Johnson family [laughter], and the question put to me by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], who himself says he is so straight in his conduct in election cases that people accuse him of falling over backward [laughter]—I submit that the answer and the question show that I am correct in saying that there is no law that makes the decision of one Congress in an election case binding on either the conscience or the law or the common sense or the vote of another Congress. If there is any, show it. Do not be like the man that the story is told about. He said he could jump down 100 feet into straw; and after he made the bet, and the people all gathered round and he started to get ready to jump, got upon the top of a pillar and jumped off and came down 50 feet, when his brother hollored, "There is glass in the straw," and he turned around and jumped back. [Great laughter.] Do not be like him. You say there is glass in this straw. Show it to us. Show us the reason for spending $2,500 for doing something that is absolutely unnecessary. The wild Indians paint their faces; we do not think much of it. Some ladies paint theirs; perhaps it is a good thing, because it improves them; but does it improves us, and does it improve a decision to have it digested? Why, whoever heard of digesting a decision of a justice of the peace, even in Massachusetts? [Great laughter.]

Now, we are called upon to pay out $2,500. It is not much; it does not bother me very much. I voted here—no; I beg pardon, I did not vote—to suspend the rules when we paid out $50,000,000 in this bill of an unpronounceable name, under the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], but nobody objected, and there was not even a wry face; there was not as much as a child makes when taking cod-liver oil when prescribed by its mother; but here, now, I am objecting to paying out $2,500, not because of the amount, for I am as liberal with other people's money as anybody is in this country [great laughter]; but I am objecting to it because it is absolutely unnecessary. It will not do a bit of good. What is the use of issuing a book that will not benefit anybody? [Laughter.] What is the use of a book that no benefit is to be derived from? Any gentleman can see that there would be no benefit derived from this.

Mr. LOUD. These three clerks that have been named in the resolution would benefit by it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. My colleague from California, with that method he has of reaching the keynote of a proposition, has perhaps stated the reason for this. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman from California allow me——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. In a minute, Brother Johnson. While my colleague from California is "LOUD" by name, he is not by nature; and when he does strike a responsive chord in my heart, and it is very seldom, I am glad to be able to unite with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I just want to say to the gentleman, in answer to the suggestion of his colleague from California, that so far as I am personally concerned I have not the least objection to striking out the name of the clerk of Committee No. 2. I would ask the House, if it deems it proper, to strike out the names of all the clerks and insert any other name it desires; but if it does not have this necessary digest made, it will meet the reproach of the Committee on Elections of the next Congress. I have no pride or opinion about this matter. I would simply like to see this resolution pass, as I know that the digest is a necessity.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, vehemence of assertion is good before a jury, but seldom weighs before a court; and while I acknowledge the gentleman's statement as being strong at least in language and in manner, yet the mere fact—and I say it with due deference and all politeness—the mere fact that he has said it thus strongly does not add to its weight. [Laughter.] There must be some reason given for the passage of this resolution and the statement made by the gentleman. Now, I was saying, or attempting to say, why report the decisions of a justice of the peace? We report the decisions of the court of last resort in various States; and whilst speaking about that, I am informed by an ex-judge of our California supreme court that the reporter in our State is paid $3,000 a year, and he reports between 600 and 700 cases. It seems to me that $2,500 for reporting 40 cases, of which, I believe, 5 were uncontested, is rather good pay. Out in California we pay good prices, and we thought that reasonably good, and perhaps a high pay.

Now, in reference to what the gentleman has stated about the clerks, I may be mistaken; but, if I remember correctly, when this resolution came in it only included two clerks, the clerks of Committee No. 2 and Committee No. 3. That is my recollection, and it was only when the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS] moved an amendment that the other clerk came in. Why that was done I do not know. Had these gentlemen on committees Nos. 2 and 3 hunted in couples and discovered this particular bone and did not want anybody else to gnaw at it? [Laughter.] Of course, I know the committees did not do it. [Laughter.] The gentleman says it is necessary.

Now, let us see whether it is necessary. Unfortunately for the people of California and for the people of the United States, as was kindly suggested to this House some months ago by my colleague from California [Mr. LOUD], I shall not be a member of the next House. [Laughter.] It is unfortunate for the people. They will regret their mistake every day, and the longer I live and the longer Congress continues the more they will regret that I was not reelected. [Laughter.] Therefore I can speak of the next Congress without saying anything about myself. In that Congress there will have to be decided certain election cases. Now, does anybody pretend to say that the decision, for instance, of Committee No. 2 in the contested case of Benoit against Boatner, where that committee did not have the courage to do what they ought to have done, will govern anybody in the next House—any Republican, I mean? Does anybody think that that decision, which gave the law to the contestant and the seat to the contestee, will be of any value as a precedent? [Laughter.] Why, Mr. Speaker, that decision ought not to be digested; it ought to be kept out of the record.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. The committee ought to keep it out.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. As suggested by my friend from Pennsylvania, the committee ought to keep it out. [Laughter.] I mention that as one decision that will not bind the conscience or the common sense of the next House. But will any of these decisions bind the next House?

Mr. MERCER. I suggest that the gentleman file a contest in the next Congress himself. We may be able to do something for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, here is a David come to judgment! [Laughter.] The reason I did not say "a Daniel come to judgment" was because when Daniel came to judgment he finally got into the lion's den, while our friend David from Nebraska never gets into any lion's den, but is always in a safe place, and can always succeed at home, because he is always in favor of an appropriation for the Omaha International Exhibition. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the good of this legislation? I beg pardon if I am talking too long about it, and I hope that by keeping the floor so long I shall not cause my friend from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to have spasms, he knowing that the public business is waiting. [Laughter.] I will say to him to soothe his perturbed spirit [laughter], that I am ready to vote with him on any proposition, as I have always done heretofore. Now, Mr. Speaker, to get back to the pending resolution, what is the good of it? I hope the House will vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]—and it gives me pain to refer to that amendment [laughter]—I hope the House will vote it down, because the amount it carries is too much. If you want this work done, it is not necessary to pay so much for it. I hope the House will vote down all the propositions for this work, because it is absolutely unnecessary. Gentlemen say that other Congresses have voted money for the same kind of work. Suppose they have. Does that make it right? Is there any rule of law which makes two wrongs or three wrongs equal to one right? I know of none. I hope every member present will vote against the amendment. I hope they will all vote also against the original resolution, and let us remit this whole matter to the next Congress, which will undoubtedly be able to attend to its business in its own way without any of our assistance. I reserve the balance of my time. I make that reservation. Mr. Speaker, because I am informed that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] desires to be heard, and if he does I wish to yield to him.

Mr. Speaker, is it in order for me to make a motion at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is in order for the gentleman to make a motion.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then I move that this whole matter be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to speak further on this proposition, and unless some gentleman desires more time I shall ask for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has moved that the business be referred to the Committee on Printing, and that is the pending motion.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG], a member of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to discuss the proposition whether this digest should be ordered prepared. The Committee on Accounts, not having had the privilege of hearing any remarks from the gentleman from California, took the position that probably this House would continue the practice which has been followed from the organization of the House of Representatives and would provide for bringing the digest of election cases decided by the House up to date. We have such digests up to the Fifty-third Congress, but none since that Congress. Of course, if the House intends to abandon the practice of digesting its election cases, if it wishes to follow the lead of the gentleman from California, who says that such a digest is of no use or consequence, I have no objections to make, although I do not agree with him that this is the best course to pursue. If the House desires the Committees on Election in the next Congress to consider the cases that may come before them without regard to what previous Houses have done, that is for the House to determine.

But, Mr. Speaker, as to the question of amount, I wish to call attention to what it was that prompted the Committee on Accounts to favor this resolution appropriating $2,500 out of the contingent fund. The Fifty-third Congress was an economical Congress. The House was Democratic and was devoted to the doctrine of economy, and yet that House allowed $1,000 for the preparation of a digest of contested-election cases decided in the Fifty-second Congress, the volume being that which I hold in my hand.

Mr. WATSON. How many cases are there?

Mr. LONG. There are six cases, and this digest is a book of 200 pages. That economical House having allowed $1,000 for the preparation of a digest containing only six cases, your Committee on Accounts believed that it was proper to allow $2,500 for preparing a digest which would contain over forty cases, which would make a book five or six times as large as this, and would involve work five or six times as great as that which was required to prepare the digest of the cases decided in the Fifty-second Congress. That is why the Committee on Accounts recommended this allowance, and I do not believe the House regards that committee as profligate in its recommendations, because I know that the committee has endeavored to carefully guard the contingent fund and to make none but proper allowances from it. The committee believed that if it was worth $1,000 to digest six cases, it would be worth at least $2,500 to digest the cases decided in the Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Congresses, numbering over forty. For this reason we reported the resolution favorably, and I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] should be rejected.

Mr. LEIGHTY. Does the gentleman think $1,000 a proper amount to be paid for that digest?

Mr. LONG. I think it is not too much for the making of a proper digest. I do not think very much of the digest or of the reports contained in that volume; but, all the same, I think it is the duty of the House of Representatives, notwithstanding the opinion of the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON], to keep the digests of decisions of the House of Representatives on election cases up to date. It has been done from the beginning of the Government, and I do not think the practice should be abandoned.

Mr. PAYNE. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. JOHNSON of California to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing; there were—ayes 72.

Mr. ALDRICH of Illinois (before the negative vote had been taken). Mr. Speaker, is it in order now to make a point of order that the motion of the gentleman from California is out of order?

The SPEAKER. That point could not be entertained now.

Mr. ALDRICH of Illinois. Well, I call the attention of the House to the fact.

The Speaker (having taken the negative vote on the question) announced—ayes 73, noes 30.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. No quorum.

The SPEAKER (after counting the House). There are 184 members present—a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 13 voting in favor thereof.

So the motion of Mr. JOHNSON of California was agreed to.

LEAVENWORTH SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. GROUT, from the special investigating committee upon the Leavenworth Soldiers' Home, submitted a report accompanied with a bill.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the gentleman asks that this report and bill be printed.

Mr. GROUT. I will inquire whether the report is privileged?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is privileged in such a sense that the measure comes before the House for consideration. It is privileged to be reported.

The bill (H. R. 10357) relating to the National Home for Disabled Soldiers was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and referred to the House Calendar.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE.

Mr. BABCOCK. I now claim the floor for business of the Committee of the District of Columbia. I call up for present consideration the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7469) for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks, cross walks, and gutters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Mr. BABCOCK. The effect of these amendments is simply to insert at various places in the bill the word "agent," after the word "owner;" so as to read, "owner, agent, or tenant."

The question being taken, the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] to an imperfection or omission in one part of the bill. In the sixth line the language is, "cause the same be removed entirely." There seems to be an omission. The gentleman can take his leisure in ascertaining how the language should read.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that the clerical error referred to be corrected by inserting "to."

The SPEAKER. It would be necessary that similar consent should be obtained in the Senate.

Mr. BABCOCK. The bill could be returned to the Senate for this correction, could it not?

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the best course would be to nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate and have the matter arranged in a committee of conference. If there be no objection, the action of the House just taken in concurring in the amendments of the Senate will be vacated and the House will nonconcur in the amendments, and ask for a committee of conference.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

FRANCISCO PERNA.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10178) for the relief of Francisco Perna.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the real estate lying in the District of Columbia heretofore purchased by and conveyed to Francisco Perna, of Montgomery County, in the State of Maryland, prior to the passage of this act, be relieved and exempted from the operation of an act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizenship, approved March 3, 1887, and all forfeitures incurred by force of said act are in respect to such real estate hereby remitted.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill is in the same form as a number of bills heretofore passed by this House. It simply proposes to remove the legal disabilities of the party named, so that he may exercise his title and interest in real estate which he has purchased in this District.

Mr. WHEELER. It is of the same character as bills which we have frequently passed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What are the special circumstances of this case?

Mr. BABCOCK. The circumstances of this case are, perhaps, not different from those of many others, except——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. But what are they?

Mr. BABCOCK. Except that this party, Francisco Perna, who, from his name, is probably an Italian, bought real estate in the District of Columbia without knowing of his legal incapacity as an alien to acquire real estate; so that now he can neither mortgage nor transfer the property.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What is the provision in the bill about forfeiture? I believe I heard some provision of that kind read.

Mr. BABCOCK. It simply provides that he shall be relieved from any forfeitures incurred by the enforcement of the present law.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Has there been any forefeiture already incurred?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not any that the committee are advised of.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. How much real estate is involved?

Mr. BABCOCK. I am not able to state.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think one or two small lots.

Mr. BABCOCK. One or two lots.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A small quantity.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I have been unable to hear the conversation between the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK]. I am still in the dark as to what disabilities are to be removed by this bill and why this special legislation should be offered.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE], that this man is an alien; that he innocently and without knowledge of the present statute bought one or two lots in the city of Washington, neither of which can be transferred or encumbered without this enabling act. This is a copy of numerous acts that have passed Congress during the past two sessions.

Mr. HULICK. You say this beneficiary is an alien. Has he made application to become a citizen? Unfortunately the report favoring the adoption of this bill does not set forth the facts in the case.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman is a member of the committee.

Mr. HULICK. Yes; but, unfortunately, I never heard of the case before.

Mr. BABCOCK. The facts presented in this case were similar to those presented in the other cases.

Mr. HULICK. In every other case reported to the committee, to my knowledge, it was alleged that the beneficiary had either become a citizen of the United States or had made application to become a citizen. In this case I understand that he has not made application.

Mr. BABCOCK. I take it for granted that he has made application. I am not certain.

Mr. HULICK. I see that the gentleman who reported the bill [Mr. WELLINGTON] is present.

Mr. BLUE. I should like to have the report read, so that we may ascertain still further what the reason is, if there be any, why this bill should pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BARRETT). Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE]?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLUE. I have asked for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the reading of the report is in the nature of debate. The Chair asked the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] whether he yielded to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] in order that the report might be read.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, I yield.

Mr. BLUE. I was attempting to address the Chair in my own right, and supposed I had been recognized.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor, I believe, and I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLUE. How much time do you yield to me?

Mr. BABCOCK. How much time do you want?

Mr. BLUE. Give me ten minutes.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, five minutes. We have lost two hours already, and the time this afternoon is very short.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, how long is that report?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the report can be read in a very few seconds.

Mr. BLUE. Then I desire to have it read in my time.

The report (by Mr. WELLINGTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10178) for the relief of Francisco Perna, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it to the House with the recommendation that it do pass without amendment.

The bill has been recommended for favorable action by the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. BLUE. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no statement of facts there to inform the House why this special relief should be granted. If it is the purpose of the lawmaking power of this Government to validate the act of every alien who comes to the Territories and purchases real estate, then the law that is now upon the statute books is a dead letter. The very reason why such a law is upon the statute books is that the people of this country do not propose to foster or favor alien ownership of lands. If this bill is simply to follow the line of a precedent, and if we are to enact a bill for the relief of every alien who comes and purchases land, then of what value is the general law upon the subject? If this bill was brought here with the understanding that the party desiring this relief was about to become a citizen of the United States, it would come in a very different attitude, and much more wisely and better supported. Without having that information, I for myself shall insist upon voting against the measure, and I appeal to the House to vote down a provision of this character, because I believe that in its very essence it is vicious and bad. If this is to be followed as a precedent, better repeal the general law and be done with it, and give to aliens the same right of ownership in the real estate of this country that American citizens have.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON], who reported the bill.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the facts in this case are somewhat of this order: The report as drawn here was drawn hurriedly. I have been looking after some other matters. I introduced this bill and reported it. This man purchased some real estate. He was an ignorant Italian, knowing nothing of the law. He did not know that it was necessary for him to become a citizen of the United States before he purchased. Since then he has become a citizen of the United States, and this act is merely trying to relieve him because he did not become a citizen previously. I think that the appeal of the gentleman from Kansas is not in the right direction; and I believe if he had known the circumstances surrounding the case he would not have made that appeal. I believe it is an act of justice to this poor man to pass this bill. I do not know that I can say anything more.

Mr. HEPBURN. You ought to have said that at the right time.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I think this is the right and proper time. It is never too late to do good.

Mr. BLUE. If the gentleman from Maryland will allow me, my serious objection to this measure was that there was no statement of fact in the report indicating to this House that this man desired to become a citizen or had any such intention. If the gentleman from Maryland is certain that he has complied with the laws of the land, and has become a citizen of the United States, I will not press my objection.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I have been so assured by the attorneys of the man named. I have no doubt that is a correct statement of the fact. He has become a citizen, as I understand it, and I believe it is but just and proper to pass this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FRANCIS HALL AND OTHERS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask present consideration of the bill (S. 2469) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to quitclaim and release unto Francis Hall and Juriah Hall, and their heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the east 20 feet front by the full depth of 100 feet of lot 2, in square 498, in the city of Washington, D. C., as laid down on the original plan or plat of said city.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to quitclaim and release unto Francis Hall and Juriah Hall and their heirs and assigns all the right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to the east 20 feet front by the full depth of 100 feet of lot 2, in square 498, in the city of Washington, D. C., as laid down on the original plan or plat of said city.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK] who reported the bill to make a statement in reference to it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BARRETT). The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WHEELER. Should not this bill be considered in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that the bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole. Does the gentleman wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WHEELER. It disposes of public land, and I do not think that there is any question that it is subject to the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is on the Union Calendar. The United States has no title at all, neither do they claim any title to this land. This act is simply to cover what would be a defect in the transfer.

Mr. WHEELER. I would say, in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the bill on its face distinctly says that the Government of the United States is to quitclaim Government property to individuals. There is nothing clearer than that when a bill upon its face makes it subject to the point of order that it should first be considered in Committee of the Whole. There can be no question about the absolute necessity for it being so considered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suggest to the Chair that the bill is on the Union Calendar now. The bill shows that it is not on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the indorsement on the bill shows that it is on the Private Calendar. It is in Committee of the Whole and not in the House.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will listen to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I shall make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider several bills; and if the Chair decides that it is necessary to consider this bill in Committee of the Whole, I will ask to withdraw it until that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is no statement of the fact; nevertheless, it carries with it the idea that this is a proposition to release certain Government property; and therefore the point of order should be held as well taken, and the gentleman from Wisconsin, under these circumstances, withdraws the bill. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REASSESSMENT OF WATER-MAIN TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. I now call up the bill (H. R. 10331) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, in all cases not exempted by this act, where water-main taxes or assessments in the District of Columbia have been quashed, set aside, or declared void by the supreme court of said District, or have been otherwise canceled or set aside by reason of such tax or assessment not having been authenticated by the proper officer, to reassess all lots or parcels of ground in respect of such taxes or assessments, with power to assess and collect the same according to existing law relating to the assessment and collection of water-main assessments or taxes: Provided, That in cases where such assessments have heretofore been quashed or declared void by said supreme court, or have been otherwise canceled or set aside for the reason hereinbefore provided, the reassessment herein provided for shall be made within one year from the passage of this act: And provided further, That hereafter all water-main taxes or assessments in the District of Columbia shall be levied and authenticated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who are hereby authorized to designate the official whose duty it shall be to notify the owner or agent of any lot or land of any water-main tax or assessment levied against such lot or land: Provided, however, That where lots or parcels of land have been released from water-main taxes or assessments by reason of technical defects or errors in making such assessments, and where such lots or parcels of land have been sold by the former owner between the order of said release of said tax or assessment and the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not reassess the same against such property in the hands of bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the failure to put the water-main assessment on said property.

SEC. 2. That outside the city of Washington the said reassessment shall be levied or assessed only on those lots or parcels of land into which Potomac water has been or shall hereafter be introduced: Provided, That where Potomac water has heretofore been introduced, the said reassessment shall be made within ninety days after the passage of this act, and that where Potomac water shall be hereafter introduced the said reassessment shall be made within thirty days after such introduction: And provided further, That any levy, assessment, or reassessment on land not subdivided into blocks and lots shall be made on a frontage not exceeding 100 feet for each lot or parcel of land or premises into which Potomac water has been or shall be introduced, and shall be considered in any subsequent subdivision of such property as having extended to a depth of not exceeding 100 feet from the front of said lot or parcel of land: And provided further, That said water-main tax or assessment or reassessment shall be due, payable, and collectible on each lot or parcel of land or premises on and after the date on which the connection is made from the water main to the said lot or parcel of land or premises.

SEC. 3. That in any assessment or reassessment made under the provisions of this act, the owner of any lot or parcel of land shall be credited with any amount which may have been heretofore paid upon any water-main tax or assessment levied against such lot or parcel of land.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHANNON] who made the report.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the reading of the report that accompanies the bill.

The report (by Mr. SHANNON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10331) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, beg leave to submit the following report:

This bill, with the exception of section 2, is an exact copy of the bill (H. R. 3279) which passed both Houses of Congress during the closing days of May, 1896, and which the President, before signing it, was requested to return to the House upon the discovery that section 2 was so defective in its phraseology as likely to invite still further litigation, and so defeat one of the very objects which the District Commissioners had in view when they urged the passage of that measure.

It was at first thought best to simply amend section 2 by a joint resolution, and for that purpose Senate joint resolution 158 was promptly introduced, and passed the Senate in June of last year. It was subsequently considered by your committee, and is now on the House Calendar awaiting action.

In view, however, of the peculiar status of the original measure—that while it has passed both Houses, it is not yet a perfected act, still lacking the President's signature; and, further, that it might easily be urged hereafter that the whole proceeding was irregular on the ground that alterations had been made that went far beyond mere changes of phraseology, thus involving the measure in complications that it is but prudent to avoid—your committee, following the counsel of those most competent to advise in such matters, concluded it would be better to introduce an entirely new bill that would only differ from the previous one in such changes as were considered necessary to be made in section 2.

The following is section 2 of the original bill (H. R. 3279), which passed both Houses of Congress last year:

"SEC. 2. That where outside the city of Washington Potomac water shall hereafter be introduced, said water-main tax or assessment shall be levied or assessed within thirty days after such introduction; and where Potomac water has been heretofore introduced the assessment or reassessment shall be made within ninety days after the passage of this act; and such levy, assessment, or reassessment on unsubdivided land shall be made on a frontage not exceeding 100 feet for each lot or parcel of land or premises into which Potomac water has been or shall be introduced, and shall be considered in any subsequent subdivision of such property as having extended to a depth of not exceeding 100 feet from the front of said lot or parcel of land: Provided, however, That said water-main tax, or assessment, or reassessment shall be due, payable, and collectible on each lot or parcel of land or premises on and after the date on which the connection is made from the water main to said lot or parcel of land or premises."

By comparing the foregoing with section 2 of the new bill (H. R. 10331) now presented, and the passage of which is earnestly recommended by the District Commissioners, it will be seen that the alterations proposed are mainly changes in the phraseology so as to render the meaning more definite and clear, since any uncertainty as to the meaning of the law is sure to lead to further litigation and probable loss of public revenues.

In the first part of section 2 of House bill 3279, given above, occurs the phrase "water-main tax or assessment," and again, in the same connection, further on, there is the phrase "assessment or reassessment." It is considered necessary that the wording in this clause be modified so as to make it refer, with certainty, to reassessments only, for in its present form it is uncertain in its meaning and is susceptible of various interpretations. It may refer to either original assessments or to reassessments, or to both. It is most desirable that the reference here should be to reassessments only, and that there should be no disturbance whatever of the present well-determined status of original assessments, about which there is no contention. This can be accomplished by striking out such words as "water-main tax" and "assessment," and making the other changes proposed in section 2 of the new bill now recommended.

It is also thought advisable to further change section 2 of House bill 3279, given above, by substituting in place of the words "unsubdivided land" the words "land not subdivided into blocks and lots." This change is suggested in the interest of property owners and can not be objected to, since it encourages the opening of streets in that portion of the District outside of the limits of the city of Washington.

Its effect is such that an owner of unsubdivided land can open streets through his property and need not fear the levying of assessments for a water main, arbitrarily laid, so long as he does not subdivide the land into lots and blocks. On the other hand, the District would be fully protected, since it could insist upon a complete subdivision into blocks and lots as a prerequisite to the laying of water mains in all cases where that is desirable; and in any event, should this measure (H. R. 10631) become law, the District would be able to collect its assessments as soon as water had been introduced into the abutting lots.

Your committee therefore favorably report the bill (H. R. 10631) "to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," and earnestly recommend that it do pass.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, the report which has just been read explains why this new bill has been introduced to replace the original bill that passed both Houses of Congress last year, but was recalled from the President in the manner described before he could take action upon it. The report also explains wherein the two bills differ. The language of both bills is exactly the same, word for word, excepting in section 2, the form of which, as given in the new bill, is preferred by the District Commissioners.

As it is nearly a year since the subject was last considered by the House, it may be well to say a word about the necessity of this legislation.

This legislation has become necessary because of a decision rendered by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia in June, 1895, the effect of which was to set aside and cancel water-main assessments extending over a period of twelve years, that is, from 1882 to 1894, and aggregating in amount the very large sum of $210,000.

The bill simply authorizes and directs the Commissioners to make another assessment in those cases.

While the decision referred to quashed the assessment in the particular case before the court, on the ground that the notice served on the abutting property owner was legally defective, it at the same time fully confirmed the validity and sufficiency of the laws under which water mains are laid and assessments therefor levied.

According to the statements made to your committee by the Commissioners of the District, it is absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the water system, and for the carrying out of such extensions and improvements as are now urgently required, that these taxes, amounting, as I have said, to the very large sum of $210,000, should be made available.

As the original measure which passed both Houses of Congress during the last session was fully discussed at the time, it would seem to be unnecessary to go further into the merits of the bill, and unless some member of the House desires to be heard upon the matter, I will now move the previous question.

Mr. WHEELER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this bill was referred to the Commissioners?

Mr. SHANNON. It was. Within the last week it was submitted to each one of the Commissioners, and they have approved the bill and are urgent for its passage.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOINT COMMISSION ON FISHERIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State covering the report of the joint commission on behalf of the United States and Great Britain, dated December 31, 1896, relative to the preservation of the fisheries in waters contiguous to the United States and Canada, as provided by the joint agreement between the United States and Great Britain, dated December 6, 1892.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 24, 1897.

POTOMAC FLATS PARK.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 3307) declaring the Potomac Flats a public park under the name of the Potomac Park.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the entire area formerly known as the Potomac Flats and now being reclaimed, together with the tidal reservoirs, be, and the same are hereby, made and declared a public park, under the name of the Potomac Park, and to be forever held and used as a park for the recreation and pleasure of the people.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Does that bill involve an appropriation?

Mr. BABCOCK. It does not.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think this bill ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that this bill disposes of no property. It makes no appropriation. Its effect is to provide that the reclaimed area known as the Potomac Flats shall not be disposed of or used for any purpose except by consent of Congress. It simply declares that area to be a public park, and I see no reason why we should go into Committee of the Whole to consider it.

Mr. DOCKERY. It dedicates public land to certain uses.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri state the ground on which he makes the point of order?

Mr. BABCOCK. The bill does not change the title to the land at all.

Mr. DOCKERY. While it is true that the bill does not change the title to the land, and while possibly, in an extremely technical sense, it may not come within the provision of the rule which relates to the appropriation of money and the disposition of public lands, yet as a matter of fact this bill does dedicate a certain portion of the public domain to a certain use. This question was brought to the attention of the Chair on a former occasion, and the Speaker pro tempore decided that the point of order was well taken.

The SPEAKER. The limitations of the rule are:

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, or referring any claim to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HENDERSON. Nothing of that sort is contemplated here. This bill does not propose to take the title out of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. But it dedicates this property to a certain use.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it dedicates the property to a certain use; that is, for use as a public park.

Mr. HENDERSON. But the title is retained in the Government.

Mr. CANNON. If the bill does not change the status of the land at all, what is the good of the measure? It seems to me that this bill, the very object of which seems to be to dispose of property belonging to the Government by devoting it to a certain use, is such an appropriation of public property as comes within at least the reason of the rule.

Mr. DOCKERY. It certainly comes within the spirit if not within the letter of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that this is an appropriation of public property for a particular purpose. When the matter was first presented, the impression of the Chair was that the bill did not come within the rule; but on examining the matter more carefully the Chair is inclined to hold a different opinion, and he sees no reason why the bill should not be discussed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 3307) declaring the Potomac Flats a public park, under the name of the Potomac Park.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that nearly every member of Congress is familiar with the appropriations which have been made and the work which has been done to reclaim the flats of the Potomac River. Something over $2,000,000 has been spent for that purpose, not only beautifying the city, but contributing greatly to its healthfulness—doing away with the malaria which used to infect this city. The purpose of this bill which has been passed by the Senate is, as I understand, not to dispose of any real estate, not to sacrifice any right which the Government now possesses, but to declare that area of improved land a public park. By doing this we shall prevent its dedication for other purposes or uses. The bill has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the District of Columbia. We can see no better purpose for which this land can be used than for the benefit of the whole people. I do not think it necessary to say anything further.

Mr. CANNON. How much is there of this land?

Mr. BABCOCK. I can not state the quantity in acres.

Mr. CANNON. About how much? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir; I can not make an estimate.

Mr. CANNON. What amount of money has it cost to reclaim these flats?

Mr. BABCOCK. About $2,100,000, as I am advised.

Mr. DALZELL. It has already cost that?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. And that has come from the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. And now the proposition is to dedicate this land forever as a park for the recreation and pleasure of the people. What will it cost to put this land in shape so as to be used for a park?

Mr. BABCOCK. Nothing, unless some plan should be taken up and carried out for its improvement.

Mr. CANNON. In its present condition this land could not be used for a park. Has the gentleman or his committee made any inquiry as to how many million dollars it would take to so improve this land as to utilize it for a park?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No such proposition has ever been made.

Mr. CANNON. But the proposition here is to make this a park. You might declare the Potomac River a park; and I am not sure it would not be wise to do so. But in point of fact we have already expended two millions and a half of dollars from the Treasury of all the people to reclaim these flats upon the ground of health. They cover, I suppose, twelve hundred or fifteen hundred acres.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not so much as that. I suppose several hundred acres, though I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Do any of these gentlemen know?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think any survey has been made of this land since it has been reclaimed. There is no survey on record.

Mr. CANNON. We have already a very considerable park system in this district. There is the Zoological Park, and there is the park joining on to the Zoological Park and running up to the District line, with capabilities for being made the most magnificent park on earth. That is to be improved, and ought to be improved. I am not saying that the legislation here proposed is unwise, but before we dedicate this land forever for use as a park, giving the public an interest in it, I should like to know what power the United States will have over this property in the future. Can we build a bridge, with abutments on this park, and spanning the river? I should like to know whether we would have that right if this dedication be made.

Mr. BABCOCK. Has not the Government control over all the parks in the District of Columbia? Is there any part of our public grounds over which the Government has not absolute control?

Mr. CANNON. I should like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. MEREDITH. I will answer that the Government would have the right to do it.

Mr. CANNON. In other words, we could change the law, notwithstanding this dedication, and take it from the people without the payment of damages?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I think so.

Mr. MEREDITH. Unquestionably. It is a public park.

Mr. CANNON. There is one question answered; but I should like to know whether it will cost $1,000,000 or $5,000,000 or $3,000,000 to make this into a park which can be actually used for park purposes. The making of a park upon paper is one thing, and the making of a park which the people can visit is another thing. What will it cost? And if it is to be made a park for the great city of Washington, is it to be done at the joint expense of the Federal Treasury and the District of Columbia? There are many of these questions that present themselves to my mind.

Mr. MEREDITH. I will answer the gentleman's question, if he will permit me.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MEREDITH. If this ground shall be turned into a park by the passage of this law, then it will come under that rule which prescribes that one-half the expense shall be borne by the District of Columbia and one-half by the Government of the United States. Now, it seems to me that the intention of Congress all along has been to reclaim this land for two purposes: First, as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] has suggested, to get rid of the malaria, and, second, to make it a grand park for this great national capital of ours in which every Representative ought to take an interest. It was for that purpose that this money has been expended, and when it has been declared to be a park, it seems to me that the expense will be borne equally by the District of Columbia and by the Federal Treasury, as it ought to be.

Mr. CANNON. Does that meet with the approval of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. MEREDITH. That will come up afterwards.

Mr. DOCKERY. I shall be glad to offer an amendment in the line of the suggestion which has been just made.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]?

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to offer the amendment at this time. I do not care to have it voted upon now, but wish to have it presented when the proper time comes.

The amendment offered by Mr. DOCKERY was read, as follows:

Provided, That one-half the sum already expended for the reclamation of this land shall be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands this is read for the information of the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. No; it is offered as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] yield for that purpose?

Mr. BABCOCK. I understood the gentleman to say that he had the amendment read for the information of the committee, and that later he would offer it as an amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well. I will withdraw it until it can be offered under the rules.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. It is contemplated, is it not, that there shall be expensive improvements, costing a great deal of money, for the completion of this park?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not at present, but in the future.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Well, it is the entering wedge, is it not, for large appropriations in the future, for the purpose of improving and beautifying the park, that it may answer the purpose for which it is designed?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; I suppose it is.

Mr. MEREDITH. Should not that be done?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I think in a House as economically disposed as this is it might be a matter of very grave doubt.

Mr. WELLINGTON. It does not bind the House to do anything hereafter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am told that it will require a great deal of improving in order to make a good park out of it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Some time ago a memorial was presented to the Committee on Public Lands suggesting the propriety of using these flats something on the Pingree plan, for the benefit of the poor of the District of Columbia, until such time as the Government could use the land for park purposes, or until its preparation for park purposes should be entered upon. In the meantime some of the officers having charge of the charities of the District could control this land and allow it to be cultivated, the cultivation aiding in the destruction of malaria, and at the same time giving employment to some of the poor of the city. I would ask the gentleman if the committee have considered this proposition, or if it has been laid before the Committee on the District of Columbia at all?

Mr. BABCOCK. It has not.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is he familiar with the plan submitted by the Fish Commissioners for the improvement of this ground as a public park out of the appropriation made from year to year in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, there has been no plan for the improvement of this land submitted to the committee.

Mr. DALZELL. I have been advised that the Fish Commissioners submitted a plan whereby, in the expenditure of the regular appropriation made from year to year by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for the reclamation of these flats, the work intended to be accomplished by the appropriation and the making of a park could both go on at the same time, through the expenditure of that money. If that be so, it seems to me it would be a wise thing to pass this bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3328) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes."

POTOMAC FLATS PARK.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] five minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a meritorious bill. It does not provide for the expenditure of a dollar. It does not provide for any change in the title to this property. The fact is that this land down there in the bottom, on the Potomac, has been reclaimed by the United States Government. This bill does not contemplate changing the title to that property in the slightest degree. It does not contemplate that there shall be a dollar expended for its improvement and in beautifying it and making a park of it at this time.

Now, in answer to the suggestion made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], he knows very well that if hereafter, whether that bill pass or not, Congress desires to spend any money for the improvement and beautifying of this ground, Congress has the right to do so. This bill, if it passes, does not put any obligation on Congress, now or hereafter, to expend one dollar in beautifying or improving it. As I understand the object and purpose of the bill, it is simply to say that this property shall not be taken by the Government itself, shall not be taken for purposes of building upon it or dedicating it to any private use, but that it shall be simply reserved to the Government of the United States as a public park.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. PITNEY. The land is now the property of the Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is.

Mr. PITNEY. And it has been made valuable land because of the expenditure of $2,000,000?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think so.

Mr. PITNEY. Can it be applied to any public or private purposes except by Congress?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir.

Mr. PITNEY. Then what advantage is to be derived from the passage of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is simply a declaration that others shall keep off it; that the Government of the United States will not dedicate to any kind of private use, nor permit it to be used for any private purpose.

Mr. PITNEY. In this connection will the gentleman permit me to give notice of an amendment that I propose to offer at the proper time?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not want to give way to permit you to give notice of an amendment. You will have ample time. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has already indicated that he desires to tax the District of Columbia with one-half of the cost of reclaiming this property. My friend would not insist, I think, for a moment that it is just and proper, or that the United States would deem it a wise and proper thing to do to expend this money for the reclamation of this land there and then charge the District of Columbia with half of the cost in order to protect the health of the people of the District of Columbia, in order that the Potomac River might be confined within proper bounds, in order that its banks might not be malarial. The Congress of the United States has seen fit to expend this money in the reclamation of this land. Now, the gentleman from Missouri never contemplated it, when the measures were before Congress, since he has been a member, and he never thought of offering an amendment to tax the District of Columbia with one-half of the expenditure of money on that reclamation.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me explain my amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to offer my objections to it now, while I have the floor. I would not have an opportunity after you have explained your amendment. There is no proposition to give it to the District of Columbia; no proposition to give the District of Columbia any additional rights upon that territory that it does not already possess. There is no intention to provide that the Congress of the United States shall make a park, such as the Soldiers' Home or the Zoological Gardens, for the benefit of the District; but simply to prevent others, to prevent Congress, if you please, to prevent the Committee on Appropriations, if you please, at some future day, from putting into some appropriation bill, when in conference, some dedication of a portion of it for the use of anybody, for the use of some person, or some private corporation. The object is simply for Congress to make this declaration, that this property shall be reserved for public purposes, if you please; reserved for the Congress of the United States hereafter to dispose of it and as it sees fit. There is no obligation upon Congress now to expend a dollar; no invitation to expend one. Nobody purposes to expend any money upon it, so far as I am informed. It is simply to make it a reservation and announce the declaration or intention of Congress that it shall be reserved for public purposes, and not for any private use or private purpose. That is all there is in it, so far as I can see. I think it would be very unwise and improper to adopt the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Missouri. He has been a member of the Committee on Appropriations a long time. He is a valuable member, an able member, and he has looked after matters for the District of Columbia. There is no proposition to change the title to this property. There is no proposition here to cede any interest to the District of Columbia for which the District of Columbia should have taken out of the revenues of the District one-half of the money appropriated by him, by his committee, and upon his recommendation, in the Congresses that have gone by, in order to make a reclamation of this land there. The gentleman has no reason to make the proposition, in my judgment.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. HULICK. The title to all this property about which this controversy arises and is involved in this bill is now vested in the Government of the United States, is it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULICK. Then it does not affect the title of the property, except as to dedication of the purposes and uses for which it is to be hereafter used?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all. It does not change the title.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him if there is any litigation pending as to the title of this land?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not that I am informed of. The purpose for which I rose was to dispel any idea that might exist in the minds of the House that this was to vest any liability on the Government now or hereafter to make expenditures there. It is simply a declaration that Congress will not expend any money upon it for the purpose of improvement at this time; that it will not permit it to be used or occupied by any private corporation or private person or individual; but that it will reserve it and dedicate it to public purposes, and so hold it for the future. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve his time?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do; but I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee, I desire to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] to read an amendment which he will offer at the proper time. It seems to be wise and timely.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to put into the bill explicitly what gentlemen say is the real purpose of the bill; and instead of dedicating this land for a public park, naming it as such and devoting it to use as a park for the recreation of the people, I propose to strike out all after the word "hereby," in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof these words: "reserved for such public purposes as shall be hereafter specified by Congress, and no part thereof shall be devoted to or used for any private purpose without the consent of Congress."

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a very few moments. The Government had expended up to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, out of its own Treasury, no part having been contributed by the District of Columbia, $1,983,467.68 for the reclamation of the lands known as the Potomac Flats. At that time the engineer estimated that $531,365 additional would be necessary to complete the work. That work was undertaken by the United States Government, as I understand, because of sanitary considerations, the condition of the Potomac Flats absolutely jeopardizing the public health of this city. I will say very frankly that in offering the amendment I did a few moments since I had no real desire to require the citizens of the District to pay one-half of this expenditure.

This was an improvement made by the Government on its own lands, and therefore the people of the District should not be charged with any portion of the expense, unless they seek to secure an advantage from that work by having the land dedicated as a public park. There are only two purposes for which this land can probably be used. One use is for a park, which is very doubtful, and the other is for a navy-yard or some such purpose. I do not myself believe that this land can be used with safety for a park. Even though it has been reclaimed, it is not so located that people would care to gather there in numbers for pleasure and recreation, and even if it is to be used as a park, that means a further expenditure of an untold amount in order to prepare it for such use.

Now, the committee are without a single estimate as to the probable cost of such preparation.

In reply to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] in charge of this bill states that he has no estimate and can give the House no information as to what amount of money will be necessary to properly prepare these flats for use as a pleasure resort.

Mr. BABCOCK. That, of course, will depend entirely on the plan that may be worked out. The plan may be an expensive or it may be a simple one. No plans have been submitted.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, I submit that any plan which looks to the use of this land as a park will necessarily involve the expenditure of not less than from one to three million dollars; certainly not less than one million. It is a matter of guessing, and I can guess as well as the gentleman from Wisconsin or anyone else. The House, I repeat, is without information on this subject, and it ought to have that information. Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are not going to use this land for a park, what is the purpose of this bill? If the views advanced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] are to prevail, why not accept the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY]? And if in the sweet by and by Congress should determine that this land shall be used for a public park, it will then be time enough to make the dedication.

The condition of the Treasury does not warrant the proposed dedication at this time, because I want to advise the House now that this bill clearly looks to further appropriations by the Government to make these flats available for park purposes. There is no danger, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, that this land will be used for any other purpose. If it is used for any other purpose, it can be so used only after Congress shall have given the authority. The gentleman from Tennessee says he desires to prevent it from being used for commercial or other purposes. I agree with him. But I ask him, Why not accept the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, which simply declares that this land shall not be used for any other purpose until Congress shall have expressly authorized such use? The Government has expended about $2,500,000 in reclaiming the flats. If the people of this District want a park in that unsightly location, which even now, after all these millions have been put upon it, is not suitable for such purposes, then I insist that they should pay one-half the expense. I do object to this initiatory step looking to large expenditures for a park in this locality, which is wholly unsuited for the purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman suggests that this land can be used for only two purposes, either for a park or for a navy-yard. I wish to suggest to him that if it should be desired hereafter to establish a navy-yard there the land can be used just as well for that purpose after the passage of this bill as before. This dedication will not prevent the Government at any time hereafter from establishing a navy-yard, if it sees fit to do so, on any portion of that land. This bill simply reserves the land from the aggressions of other persons.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me say to my friend from Tennessee that if the object is merely to reserve this land for any purpose for which Congress may hereafter think proper to use it, then that object is fully accomplished by the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY].

Mr. RICHARDSON. We do not antagonize such an amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman consents to yield me five minutes more; and I ask that the proposed amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey be read in my time. I hope the House will give it attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "hereby," in line 5, and insert the following: "Reserved for such public purposes as shall be hereafter specified by Congress; and no part thereof shall be devoted or used for any private purpose without the consent of Congress."

Mr. DOCKERY. The bill as amended in accordance with this proposition will read:

That the entire area formerly known as the Potomac Flats and now being reclaimed, together with the tidal reservoirs, be, and the same are hereby, reserved for such public purposes as shall hereafter be specified by Congress; and no part thereof shall be devoted or used for any private purpose without the consent of Congress.

Mr. MILNES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. MILNES. The title of this property is now in the United States?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILNES. What, then, is the use of adopting the amendment just read? This land can not be used for any purpose except by the action of Congress, and that is all the amendment provides for.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will answer the gentleman frankly. If these gentlemen are sincere—and I do not question their sincerity—in the declaration that they simply want to reserve this land, then it seems to me wholly unnecessary to pass the bill, because the title to the property is in the United States now, and the United States can not be divested of that title without some positive, affirmative act of Congress. If, however, the House desires to declare its intentions and pass something in harmony with the views of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH], then to accomplish that purpose we should enact the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY]. But if back of this proposition there is a scheme, if after having forever reserved this land as a public park we are then to proceed—and that would be the logical step—to appropriate the necessary amount of money to make this land available for a park——

Mr. MILNES. That would necessarily follow.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly, it would logically and necessarily follow—then this bill ought to pass just as it comes from the committee. If, however, the declarations of gentlemen are to be taken as their real intentions—and I do not question their sincerity in the least—then those gentlemen should assent to the proposition just read, to be offered at the proper time by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BABCOCK. Would the adoption of that amendment make the bill satisfactory to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. PITNEY. It would.

Mr. BABCOCK. If we accept that amendment, is that all you have to offer?

Mr. PITNEY. That is all we have to offer.

Mr. BABCOCK. On behalf of the committee I am willing to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has but two minutes remaining.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield those two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PITNEY. I will reserve them in order to hear from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has twenty-eight minutes remaining.

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to say that the Committee on the District of Columbia will offer no opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to ask the chairman of the District Committee—because I know he is a frank man and desires to deal fairly—whether or not, if this action be taken on the part of the House, he will adhere to it in conference, if a conference should be asked by the Senate on this question? I do not care to get this proposition into such a shape that the House will be deprived of its power to amend or insist on the proposed action.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It would hardly be fair for the House to tie a man before appointing him as a conferee. It would scarcely be polite toward the other branch of Congress to appoint conferees and tie their hands before they go into conference.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, I confess, with entire good feeling, that the unanimity with which this amendment is accepted arouses some little suspicion in the minds of some of us.

Mr. BABCOCK. The eloquent argument of the gentleman was convincing. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Is not this the effect of the amendment, that if it is enacted into law, as proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], does it not leave the matter in precisely the same condition in which it now is?

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, certainly it does.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if the committee accepts the amendment, and if such is the temper of the House, is it not a very good thing to lay the bill on the table?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think it would be wise action to lay this bill on the table.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of this bill as it has been reported by the District Committee. It involves simply the declaration of the future use of about 300 acres of reclaimed land which has been built up by mud taken by dredgers from the Potomac River. The purpose of this improvement was twofold. One was to improve the river; the other was to improve the health of Washington.

These were low flats which infected the neighboring region with malaria. We have here about 300 acres of mud reclaimed from the Potomac. It lies behind a wall of stone which is heaped up, and now makes solid soil. The question is, To what use should we put it in the future? Why should we not now declare that it is to be used as a public park? Why should we not enter upon the work of covering that mud with grass and trees? Does any man contend that that will involve a large expenditure? Why, the soil is rich and fruitful. All you have to do is to scatter grass seed over it and to plant a few clumps of trees here and there, and in a few years you have a magnificent park, that will contribute not only to the beauty of Washington, but to the health of Washington. I ask, Where is the wisdom in allowing that 300 acres of mud to swelter in the sun, unutilized, and harmful to the health of this great city?

It seems to me that this proposition ought to be voted upon now. It does not involve a parting with the title of the Government to an inch of its ground. It simply involves the declaration of the use to which that park shall be put. This improvement has been a great governmental work. The title remains in the Government, and though the use to which we propose to put it is a reasonable and fair use, the gentleman declares that the District of Columbia should now pay one-half of the cost of this great governmental improvement. It seems to me that is not a fair consideration to address here and now.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to inquire whether there is now 1 foot or 4 feet of water over this land?

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is no water over this land. It is soil that is reclaimed, and is behind a stone wall that has been placed there for the Government.

Mr. BABCOCK. Above tide water.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Above tide water; and all that this necessarily involves is the planting of a few trees and the sowing of a little grass seed. No appropriation is now made, and I believe that the wisdom and fairness of this House can be trusted, when the proper time comes, to devote a proper sum, and only a reasonable sum, for carrying out the purposes to which we propose to dedicate this property.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to say just one word. I understand the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], in view of the fact that we get no assurance from the chairman of the committee, will not offer the amendment that he proposed to offer.

Mr. LACEY. I desire to offer an amendment. Will the gentleman yield for that purpose?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate has not been closed.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I will ask whether it is proper for the gentleman to withdraw his amendment after it has been accepted by the committee?

Mr. DOCKERY. It has not been formally offered yet.

Mr. WELLINGTON. It has been accepted by the committee, however.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say, in reply to the parliamentary inquiry, that no amendment is pending. This is a mere matter of reading for the information of the committee.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that general debate be considered as closed.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that general debate be considered as closed.

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. WHEELER. I understood it was not a request for unanimous consent, but a motion made by the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Motions are not in order at this time.

Mr. PITNEY. I will say to the chairman of the committee [Mr. BABCOCK] that if he will give us any assurance that the amendment I propose will, if adopted by the House, go into the bill if enacted into law, or else that we shall have fair notice to oppose the bill in any other form on a conference report, I have no objection to still adhering to that amendment, which, I think, is as far as we ought to go.

Mr. MEREDITH. In other words, you would put a man on the jury and swear him to decide in a certain way before the case is heard at all.

Mr. PITNEY. I do not ask to have the conferees commit themselves, except to this extent, that if the Senate conferees will not agree to a report embodying my amendment to the bill, we shall all have fair notice of the conference report, so that we may oppose its adoption.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. We can not hear. It is impossible in the confusion to hear what particular dicker the gentlemen are engaged in.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not see how I am authorized to speak for the committee, the conference committee, or the Committee on the District of Columbia, as to what they may do in the future. I take it for granted that the gentlemen connected with this bill on the floor will act in good faith. But it would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that if gentlemen doubt the action of the conference committee that the Speaker is likely to appoint, they had better dispose of the bill right now.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman will permit me to say that I have no doubt of the sincerity of any gentleman upon the Committee on the District of Columbia. But the gentleman is aware of the fact that in the last hours of the session we will be very busy with appropriation bills, and I may not be present on the floor of the House when the conference report is called up. If the gentleman will assure me that no conference report shall be brought in without giving notice to me, I am perfectly willing to move the amendment and have it accepted.

Mr. BRUMM. Your idea is that the committee shall agree to bind this House even without knowing what its future action may be.

Mr. PITNEY. Can the gentleman understand the English language?

Mr. BRUMM. I think I can understand the English language, and I am stating what you are trying to drive at. It simply means that you are asking this committee to bind the future action of this House as to what the House may choose to do with a conference report.

Mr. PITNEY. Then the gentleman's hearing is at fault. I ask that if the Senate conferees refuse to agree to this provision, I shall be notified by the House conferees before any other provision is brought up for action in the House.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PITNEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PITNEY. May I not make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. DOCKERY. You did not include in your motion to report the bill favorably.

Mr. BABCOCK. And report the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. That was not embodied in the motion at all. The motion did not include reporting the bill favorably.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was that the committee do rise. That was all.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HENDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3307) and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BABCOCK. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand there was an amendment pending in the committee that was not acted upon when this bill was reported.

Mr. HENDERSON. There was no pending amendment.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the committee reported that the committee had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3307; and, pending that, that debate be limited to ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3307; and, pending that motion, the gentleman submits the further motion that in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union debate shall be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend, and make it fifteen.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the original motion, that debate be limited to ten minutes.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PITNEY. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 18.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3307.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HENDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole will resume the consideration of the bill S. 3307. General debate is limited to ten minutes. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

[Mr. WHEELER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BABCOCK. Acknowledging my obligations to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], I yield back the time to the Chair. If there is no further amendment to be offered——

Mr. STEELE. I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is open for amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That one-half the sum already expended for the reclamation of this land shall be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States from the revenues of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That all improvements to said park shall be paid equally from the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. STEELE was rejected.

Mr. LACEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at end of bill:

"Provided, That until such time as the improvement of said park shall be entered upon, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to permit the cultivation of said land or parts thereof for charitable uses for the benefit of the poor of the District of Columbia."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, one word in explanation of this amendment. It will be observed that the amendment is permissive in its form. It does not require, but simply authorizes, the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, until the improvement of this land is entered upon, to use any part of it for the purpose specified in the amendment. I am not sure that much of this land is adapted to cultivation. But whatever portion may be suitable should be cultivated in some way. It is best for the health of the city that this should be done. The amendment being permissive in its form, its adoption will be entirely safe, because the Secretary of the Interior will not exercise the authority conferred upon him unless on careful investigation he should deem it desirable or necessary.

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand that this land is wash and sand and gravel; that it is in no condition to be cultivated.

Mr. GROUT. The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] told us that this land had been formed from mud and is very fertile. I judge it to be of such a character that vegetation must thrive upon it. I am, therefore, in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]. If the land can be utilized, let it be done. If the land is entirely unsuitable for cultivation, then nobody will want to use it for that purpose.

Mr. BABCOCK. All right; I will not object to the amendment.

Mr. GROUT. The amendment simply gives the Secretary authority to use the land in this way in case it may seem desirable.

Mr. MILNES. I rise to a point of order. It seems to me that this amendment is an infringement upon a patent which is exclusively owned by the State of Michigan, from which I have the honor to come—the Pingree potato patch.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I want to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. CANNON, as follows:

Add to the amendment of Mr. LACEY these words: "And the sum of $10,000 is appropriated to carry out the provisions of this act."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I like to be practical in matters of legislation. Here is a great body of land the improvement of which has already cost two million and a half of dollars. This land is said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] to be sand and gravel; it is said by other members to be very productive soil. It is proposed to "tickle it with a hoe," to allow it to be cultivated for charitable purposes under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. Now, if that amendment is to be adopted—and I am not prepared to say whether it is wise or unwise—let us have something practical. If we appropriate $10,000 to utilize this land by cultivation, that amount of money will, I anticipate, enable the Secretary of the Interior to appoint some one superintendent, at $2,500 salary, and also several farmers, at probably $1,000 each.

Mr. MERCER. Will they be under the civil-service rules?

Mr. CANNON. I think not. I think there is a chance for some of us to get these places. [Laughter.]

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. I object to this discussion unless my colleague [Mr. BROSIUS] is here.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa ought to be amended so as to make it practical.

The question being taken on Mr. CANNON'S amendment to the amendment, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest one difficulty in connection with the amendment of my colleague [Mr. LACEY]. If this bill should pass in the form proposed, then this reservation, like all the other reservations in the city of Washington, would come under the jurisdiction of the War Department, and would be in charge of the particular officer who has charge of all the other parks and reservations, whereas the amendment of my colleague proposes that the Secretary of the Interior shall have jurisdiction of this land for the purpose of cultivating potatoes or peanuts or whatever else the land may be capable of raising. I merely suggest that difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PITNEY. Now I offer the amendment which has been sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "hereby," in line 5, and insert in lieu of what follows after that word the following:
"Reserved for such public purposes as shall be hereafter specified by Congress; and no part thereof shall be devoted or used for any private purpose without the consent of Congress."

Mr. BABCOCK. You might as well kill the bill as to adopt that amendment.

Mr. PITNEY. Oh, it is a very meritorious amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PITNEY) there were—ayes 58, noes 77.

Mr. PITNEY. Tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. PITNEY and Mr. BABCOCK.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 91.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HENDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3307) declaring the Potomac Flats a public park, under the name of the Potomac Park, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TERRY. I rise for the purpose of making a suggestion for the yeas and nays. I think that, without the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], this bill ought not to pass.

The SPEAKER. There can be no further debate, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. TERRY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand the yeas and nays on the third reading of the bill?

Mr. TERRY. No; on the passage.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TERRY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 157, nays 64, not voting 134; as follows:

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the bill (S. 3608) setting apart a plot of public ground in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, for memorial purposes, under the auspices of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILWAY COMPANY, OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (S. 2840) to incorporate the East Washington Heights Traction Railway Company of the District of Columbia.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This bill should first be considered in Committee of the Whole. I want to know whether it is waived by having the bill first read in the House?

The SPEAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask by what rule it is necessary to consider that bill in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. That will have to be determined when the bill is read. The House can not tell whether a matter should go to the committee or not until it has been read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I raise the point of order that this bill should first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that it is well known to every member of the House that the committee has lost nearly half of the day. I now move that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow; and on that motion I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning; and on that he asks the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 98, noes 44.

Mr. WHEELER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes there is a quorum present. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-four gentlemen are present. The ayes have it——

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for the yeas and nays on this question——

Mr. STEELE. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 73.

TERRITORY OF ARIZONA, Office of the Secretary.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Territory of Arizona, ss:

I, Charles M. Bruce, secretary of the Territory of Arizona, do hereby certify that the annexed is a true and complete transcript of the house memorial No. 3 of the Nineteenth legislative assembly of Arizona, which was filed in this office the 20th day of February, A. D. 1897, at 2 o'clock p. m., as provided by law.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal.

Done at the city of Phœnix, the capital, this 20th day of February, A. D. 1897.

[SEAL.] CHARLES M. BRUCE,
Secretary of the Territory of Arizona.

Memorial.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the Nineteenth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, respectfully represent as follows:

The University of Arizona, recognizing the value of military training, has established a military department, under a regular member of its faculty; has made such training a part of each of its several courses of study, and has made creditable progress by its own efforts and at its own expense, without aid from the General Government.

The application of said university to the Secretary of War for the loan of ordnance and ordnance stores, usually supplied to colleges, has usually been denied on the ground that under existing laws the detail of an Army officer for duty in said university as professor of military science and tactics is a prerequisite to loaning such equipment.

The detail of an Army officer for such duty at said university can not be secured until this Territory is admitted to Statehood.

Furthermore, it appears that the bond for an amount double the value of the property, which said university would be required to enter into before the delivery to it of said property, would amply secure the Government against loss.

Wherefore we pray that Congress will provide by law for loaning to the University of Arizona ordnance and ordnance stores and other property to the same extent and under the same regulations as would be lawful if an Army officer were on duty as professor in said university; and, further, that the publications of the United States relating to military affairs be regularly supplied to the military department of said university.

Resolved by the Nineteenth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, That the secretary of the Territory is hereby requested to transmit a properly authenticated copy of this memorial to each House of the Congress of the United States, and to our Delegate in Congress.

D. G. CHALMERS,
Speaker.

FRED G. HUGHES,
President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Nineteenth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, praying Congress to approve the proposed construction, under the plans of the United States Geological Survey, of the Buttes reservoir, in Pinal County, Ariz.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TERRITORY OF ARIZONA, Office of the Secretary.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Territory of Arizona, ss:

I, Charles M. Bruce, secretary of the Territory of Arizona, do hereby certify that the annexed is a true and complete transcript of the house memorial No. 4 of the Nineteenth legislative assembly of Arizona, which was filed in this office the 19th day of February, A. D. 1897, at 2.15 o'clock p. m., as provided by law.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal.

Done at the city of Phœnix, the capital, this 20th day of February, A. D. 1897.

CHARLES M. BRUCE,
Secretary of the Territory of Arizona.

House memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled.

We, your memorialists, the Nineteenth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, respectfully represent that the National Irrigation Congress, held in Phœnix, Ariz., on the 15th of December, A. D. 1896, unanimously adopted the following:

Whereas the Pima and Maricopa Indians, tribes numbering in the aggregate 10,000 souls, have been deprived of the waters used by them in irrigation before the advent of the white race in America through the appropriation of such waters by settlers on the headwaters of the Gila River; and

Whereas through the loss of such waters the lands once cultivated by these tribes have become barren and worthless and the members of such tribe have become a charge on the Government and forced by the loss of their fields into lives of degradation and penury; and

Whereas such tribes have from the earliest days been the friends and allies of the white race; and

Whereas the people of the United States have pledged themselves by solemn treaty to protect such tribes in their property and property rights; and

Whereas the Government of the United States has and now is engaged in the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars for the construction of works of irrigation for the reclamation of lands belonging to other Indian tribes: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That this congress do approve the proposed construction, under the plans of the United States Geological Survey, of the Buttes reservoir, in Pinal County, Ariz., recently reported, to again reclaim the lands of these tribes, believing that by so doing can the Government alone honorably redeem the broken pledges made by it to these people, and thus preserve from further want and degradation two of the surviving Indian tribes of the American continent that have always been the constant friends of the white race.

Resolved, That we approve the proposed construction of such reservoir not only as just and philanthropic, but as economical and good policy, as in a comparatively short time the expense of maintaining such Indians as Government charges will far exceed the cost of the irrigation works required to make them a self-supporting and self-respecting community.

Now, therefore, your memorialists, the Nineteenth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, desire to go on record as earnestly indorsing the above recommendations of the Sixth Annual Irrigation Congress, for the following reasons:

1. The reservoir site referred to, having been withdrawn from entry by Government authorities, can not now be utilized by any private corporation, and the Government therefore occupies the indefensible position of doing nothing itself nor allowing anyone else to improve this great national reservoir site.

2. We firmly believe that the interests of humanity dictate that the Indians should be gathered on the reservations, have lands allotted to them in severalty, and that they be furnished with farming implements and an inexhaustible supply of water for irrigation of their lands. By this means will a home life be furnished for the Indian and he will more rapidly advance in civilization as a consequence. He will abandon his nomadic life; his children will be kept at home and educated in neighborhood schools, instead of being sent to large Indian schools at a distance, where they are kept (as it would seem) for mere purposes of show. After being instructed in the arts of civilization for a time they are returned to savagery, to become more unhappy and discontented than if they had never received the questionable advantages. We feel that the present policy of the Indian Department is all wrong in this regard.

3. The Pima and Maricopa Indian Reservation contains 250,000 acres of as fertile land as lies within the boundaries of Arizona, and is admirably adapted for homes for these people, as well as the wandering Papagoes, who are now compelled to prey upon the herds of our farmers and ranchmen for subsistance.

4. The construction of a storage reservoir at the Buttes by the Government offers a plain business proposition for the correction of these evils.

Resolved, That the secretary of the Territory be instructed to transmit a copy of the foregoing memorial to our Delegate and Delegate-elect in Congress, and also a copy each to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JACOB M. HAMBURGER.

Mr. HAWLEY. I report back favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 948) to remove the charge of desertion against Jacob M. Hamburger. I should like to have the Senate concur with the House in the passage of the bill. I think it is entirely just that we should let the poor man out, and then we shall never hear of it again.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of Jacob M. Hamburger, late musician in Company G, First Battalion, Twelfth United States Infantry, and to issue him an honorable discharge.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TORPEDO-BOAT DESTROYERS.

Mr. CHANDLER. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report a statement in reference to torpedo-boat destroyers, made by Mr. John Platt, which I ask may be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If there is no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business has not been concluded.

JUDGMENTS IN INDIAN DEPREDATION CASES.

Mr. HALE. I offer a resolution and ask for its present consideration. It simply calls for documents from a Department.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to; as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of the judgments of the Court of Claims in Indian depredation cases rendered up to and including the 27th instant, and requiring appropriations at the present session of Congress, and not already transmitted

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 10178) for the relief of Francisco Perna; and

A bill (H. R. 10330) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. HILL. I should like to have passed a bridge bill. If it can not be passed now it will absolutely prevent the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River during the coming summer, and it is absolutely essential that the bill should pass at the very first opportunity. A partial construction has been made upon the Canadian side, and we need this legislation now in order to enable the bridge to be constructed on this side, and the construction can not be commenced unless the bill is passed. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose. It will only take a few moments. The bill was unanimously reported, and I should like to have it passed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed.

FORM OF CREDENTIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate as a part of the morning business the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution suggesting the form of certificate of election of Senators, etc.

Mr. HOAR. The resolution has been read and the whole committee have agreed to it except to substitute the word "choosing" for "electing" before Senators, using the constitutional term. The resolution does not need to be read again. I hope it will be passed.

Mr. GRAY. That correction will be made?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, let that correction be made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution has been heretofore read. It will be modified in the manner stated. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 24th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 2101) for the relief of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces; and

An act (S. 1169) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue Springfield rifles to each State and Territory for the National Guards thereof, in exchange for other rifles now held.

PROTECTION OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN CUBA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate as a part of the morning business the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], coming over from a previous day.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HILL. I rise to a point of order. The motion can not be entertained until morning business is through.

Mr. ALLISON. It can be entertained at any time, I submit to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope this resolution will be permitted to come before the Senate. It will take but a few moments to dispose of it. I trust the Senator from South Dakota will withdraw his motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had laid before the Senate the resolution coming over from a previous day as a part of the morning business.

Mr. ALLISON. Pending that, the Senator's motion is clearly in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate the motion of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. HILL. The point of order I raise is that until the morning business is disposed of, or until one hour has elapsed, it is not in order to take up a bill from the Calendar. That is the law. I insist that my point is well taken.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I suppose this question will not require discussion. An appropriation bill is in order at any time. It has the right of way over other bills.

Mr. HILL. That has nothing to do with it. The rule is very plain. I ask for the reading of the rule.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I therefore move to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rule indicated by the Senator from New York will be read. The Chair asks the attention of Senators to the rule.

The Secretary read clause 2 of Rule VII, as follows:

Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the Chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the Calendar shall be entertained by the presiding officer, unless by unanimous consent; and if such consent be given, the motion shall not be subject to amendment and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subject proposed to be taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks there can be no question as to the rule which has been read. The Chair has laid before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. ALLEN, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should speedily and effectually protect the lives and liberties of peaceable American citizens residing or sojourning in Cuba, and that he should promptly insist that Spain in her war against her colonists in the Island of Cuba should conduct the same on principles of civilized warfare, eliminating all unusual and unnecessary cruelty and barbarity; and for the enforcement of these reasonable and just requirements, United States battle ships should be sent without delay to Cuban waters.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HILL. Before the resolution is acted upon, I should like to hear some explanation of it. It seems to be pretty broad, covering a good deal of ground; and being of an important character, I think some explanation should be tendered in regard to it before it is further considered.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have no desire at this late hour of the Congress to indulge in any lengthy speech upon this resolution, or upon any other, for that matter. I assume the facts are so well known to the American people which call for the adoption of the resolution and the measures it proposes that no one can deny the necessity of action upon the part of this Government. American citizens are arrested in Cuba and thrown into prison without any trial. Many of them are placed in cells where the consul-general can not have access to them to find out the facts of their cases. There seems to be a general disposition upon the part of the Spanish Government to punish every American citizen who either dwells upon or sojourns in the Island of Cuba. The story is a long one. It is full of atrocity and barbarity; and it would serve no useful purpose for me to read excerpts from newspapers and evidence from other sources supporting the statements contained in the resolution.

I may be permitted to refer in as delicate language as possible to two or three instances of barbarity that have occurred in that island recently. It is not denied that within a few weeks the Spanish authorities were guilty of taking an American lady and searching her person in a public manner and under circumstances of extreme cruelty. I scarcely know how to refer to this matter in my bluntness of speech, but certainly it was done at a time and under circumstances that no Christian man or woman, no civilized man or woman, could approve of.

But I refer more particularly to two instances that seem to be well established. It seems to be conclusively established that the Spanish military authorities in Cuba are gathering up the little girls in that island and selling them into a species of slavery, the worst conceivable in the human mind, selling them to lives of shame. Above that and beyond that, it seems to be conclusively established that Spanish soldiers have in one or more instances taken little infants by the heels, held them up, and hacked them to pieces with the deadly machete in the presence of the mothers and the fathers, and then have destroyed the mothers and fathers themselves.

There seems to be a disposition to heap every indignity and every species of barbarity upon American citizens and American sympathizers in that island, however peaceable they may be, and to practice the most unspeakable barbarity upon what is known as the pacificos, the inhabitants of the island, to such an extent that, in my judgment, the President of the United States will be derelict to his duty to his country, to his duty to every prompting of humanity and the civilization of the world, unless he takes prompt steps to protect the inhabitants and sojourners in that island from further barbarities.

How singular it is when we recall that a year ago Senators who are members of the Committee on Foreign Relations were inveighing strongly against the conduct of Spain in Cuba; that we voted almost unanimously here in favor of recognizing the belligerent rights of Cuba; and yet at this session in the same Congress there has been a singular silence on the part of the Committee on Foreign Relations respecting the conduct of affairs upon that island, and especially in the light of the extreme barbarity of the Spaniards to American citizens and to the people of Cuba. Is it to go on forever?

Mr. GRAY. May I interrupt the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. On the contrary, I will inform the Senator from Nebraska (perhaps he was not in the Chamber at the time) that yesterday the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate reported by one of its members to the Senate its action in regard to a matter which involves the general question upon which the Senator is speaking; and the Foreign Relations Committee is now waiting, in order that it may through one of its members bring that matter before the Senate in regular order and in accordance with the usages of the Senate, which has appointed that committee to consider these matters, and discuss them before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator does not speak in terms comprehensive enough for me to understand what the Committee on Foreign Relations has done.

Mr. GRAY. The Committee on Foreign Relations made a report yesterday and gave notice that it would bring the subject-matter of that report before the Senate this morning in the morning hour.

Mr. ALLEN. What was the report? What did they propose to do?

Mr. GRAY. The report is too long for me to state it, but it is in print.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the substance of it?

Mr. GRAY. It is in print and on the desks of Senators.

Mr. ALLEN. What do the committee propose to do?

Mr. BLACKBURN (to Mr. ALLEN). They propose what you propose to do.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Kentucky states that they propose to do as I would do in this resolution.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am for both.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to know it. Mr. President, the joint resolution referred to does not cover the question at all. The joint resolution, S. R. 207, simply covers the case of Julio Sanguily, a citizen of the United States, who, it appears, is in prison. There is not a thing proposed by the joint resolution respecting the protection of American citizens and American property generally in that island. There is not a thing proposed to be done upon the part of this Government to protect the inhabitants of the Island of Cuba from the extraordinary barbarities which I have mentioned. It can not have escaped the attention of the Senator from Delaware that little girls upon that island are being gathered up and sold into lives of prostitution. It can not have escaped his attention that harmless little children, babies, have been held up by the heels and cut to pieces by a cruel and barbarous soldiery. Why are not those things embraced in the joint resolution? Why does not the Government take some steps to prevent such acts?

Now, I have said all that I desire to say, and possibly more than I ought to have said; but it does seem to me absolutely humiliating that a government of 72,000,000 people, claiming to be the most powerful government upon the face of the earth, with all the means in its hands to settle this question, will sit idly and supinely here and make no effort to protect these people, these innocent little girls and children, who are being treated with this extreme barbarity from day to day. Here is this decaying monarchy of Spain, a blot upon the map of the world, a disgrace, Mr. President, to the present civilization of Europe, a disgrace to the civilization of the Western Hemisphere; and here is Congress, with this conduct going on almost within 100 miles of our shores, and not a substantial effort is put forth to check it. Mr. President, the time will come, and come speedily, unless we take prompt action in this matter, when a man will have to hang his head for being an American citizen.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senate of the United States now for two years has had a very delicate and responsible duty to perform, having reference to the peace of this country, as well as to the proper administration of treaty rights in Cuba. The Senate has proceeded as rapidly as it felt justified in doing, in presenting from time to time different resolutions, one of which has passed, another of which is now pending, recognizing the independence of Cuba and also its belligerent rights.

It has now reached one of the cases which has been brought to the attention of the Government of the United States by the reports of our consul-general and vice-consuls in Cuba—the case of Julio Sanguily—which in the opinion of the committee furnishes a ground for intervention by this Government to demand his immediate and unconditional release. It is utterly impossible, of course, that we can deal with all of the cases as they are reported in the newspapers, because that evidence is not reliable in every instance; it seldom reaches us without some degree of exaggeration; and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations has considered that it was a solemn duty that it should receive from the Government of the United States, from the State Department, from the President, authentic information in all of the cases that might be presented before it took any final action in the recommendation of any resolution of this body. Cases of outrages upon little girls, upon children, and a number of other cases of that kind that have been spoken of in the newspapers, have not come to us in such shape as to justify us in taking any action upon them at all.

In the case of Julio Sanguily, which I had the honor to report yesterday, by consent of the committee, the evidence is all presented in Senate Document 104, which was laid before the Senate on the 1st day of February. The report which I submitted yesterday in behalf of the committee relates to that document alone, to the facts presented thus officially to the Congress of the United States by the President. No outside fact is stated. There is a reference made to our treaties, of course, which are on the treaty books, and I have those treaties now before me. A reference is also made in the report to the act of April 17, 1821, of the Spanish Government, and I have now a copy of that act translated, sent to me by the State Department, which I shall ask to have put into the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

The act referred to is as follows:

[Translation.]

Spanish decree of April 17, 1821, concerning cognizance and procedure in cases of conspiracy.

The Cortes, after observing all the formalities prescribed by the constitution, have decreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1. This law relates to proceedings instituted in the case of conspiracy or direct machinations against the observance of the constitution, or against the internal or external security of the State, or against the sacred and inviolable person of the constitutional King.

ART. 2. Those accused of these crimes, to whatever class or rank they may belong, when arrested by any body of troops, either of the regular army or of the provincial or local militia, sent expressly in pursuit of them by the Government or by the military commanders commissioned for that purpose by the competent authorities, shall be tried according to military law by the ordinary council of war prescribed by law 8, title 17, book 12, of the Novísima Recopilación (newest recompilation). If the arrest is made by the order, the requisition, or in aid of the civil authorities, the ordinary courts shall try the case.

ART. 3. Shall likewise be tried according to military law by the same council in accordance with law 10, title 10, book 12, of the Novísima Recopilación, offenders of this class who, with firearms, side arms, or any other offensive weapon, offer resistance to the troops which arrest them, belonging to the regular army or to the provincial or local militia, even if the arrest is made by the order, the requisition, or in aid of the civil authorities.

ART. 4. In order to prevent resistance and the consequent violence referred to in the preceding articles, so soon as information is received of the existence of any band or party of rebels against the constitutional government, the civil authorities shall cause to be published, without the slightest delay and under the severest penalties, a proclamation fixing a certain time and commanding the rebels to disperse immediately and return to their respective homes.

ART. 5. This proclamation shall be published and circulated with the utmost promptness throughout the district; and when the number of hours fixed by the authorities in the proclamation, as circumstances may dictate, shall have elapsed, the following persons will be presumed to have offered resistance to the troops so far as to render them amenable to martial (military) law: 1. Those who are found in company with the insurgents, even if they have no arms. 2. Those who are arrested by the troops in the act of flight, after having been with the insurgents. 3. Those who, having been with the insurgents, are found in hiding and away from their houses, with arms.

ART. 6. Those who, within the time fixed by the proclamation referred to in the foregoing articles, in obedience to the summons of the authorities, retire to their homes without having been arrested, and who were not the chief leaders of the conspiracy, and who have committed no other offense than that of having been with the insurgents for the first time, will be exempted from all penalties.

ART. 7. The duty imposed upon the civil authorities with regard to the publication of the proclamation shall not prevent them from immediately taking such steps as they may deem expedient to disperse all assemblages of insurgents, to arrest the offenders, and to crush the evil at the outset.

ART. 8. Highwaymen, robbers in the country, and robbers in towns, when in companies of four or more, if they are arrested by troops of the regular army or of the provincial or local militia under any of the circumstances referred to in articles 2 and 3, shall likewise be tried by military law, as provided in those articles.

ART. 9. In all cases under the foregoing articles, if the provincial or local militia alone effect the arrest, the ordinary council of war shall be composed of officers of that class, in accordance with (military) law, but if regular troops have cooperated in the arrest, officers of both classes shall assist at the council of war in equal numbers, and the president shall be appointed in accordance with (military) law.

ART. 10. The sentences of the ordinary council of war shall be executed immediately if the Captain-General, with the approval of his auditor, approves them. In the case of disagreement the original records shall be sent by the first mail to the spec al court of war and the navy (marina), which shall render its judgment within the strict term of three days at most, and the judgment which it renders shall be executed without the necessity of consultation.

ART. 11. In all prosecutions instituted under military law by virtue of the foregoing articles, confrontations (of prisoners or witnesses) shall be dispensed with so far as possible, in accordance with the royal order mentioned in note 16, title 17, book 12, of the Novísima Recopilación.

ART. 12. If the prosecuting attorney shall deem it expedient, in view of the gravity and the circumstances of a case in which there are several accused persons, to institute separate proceedings, he may do so in the manner most conducive to the quick despatch of the prosecution, and he shall always do so in the case of all prisoners who have confessed their guilt, or who have been convicted, to the end that their sentence and its prompt execution may not be delayed.

ART. 13. In all other cases those accused of these crimes shall be tried by the ordinary courts, to the exclusion of any other jurisdiction, even when the arrest has been made by the troops.

ART. 14. In cases arising under this law, there shall be no question of jurisdiction, except such as may arise between the ordinary and the military courts within the limits herein set forth. Such questions as may arise shall be decided by the supreme court of justice within forty-eight hours at most from the time when they are brought before it.

ART. 15. The judge of first instance, having cognizance of these cases, shall give them the exclusive preference, and may, in case of necessity, transfer those of another kind to the other judge or judges in the same town.

ART. 16. In the preliminary proceedings the commission of the crime must be fully shown, but the preliminary proceedings may be regarded as concluded and the cause may be raised to the stage of trial, even if the accused is not fully convicted, provided the proofs or evidence impress the mind of the judge with a reasonable belief that the accused is guilty or innocent and that the case presents no sufficient reasons for continuing the preliminary proceedings, or that it furnishes evidence which may be used to advantage at the trial (plenario).

ART. 17. The judge of first instance may employ any royal or licensed notary of his district to record the preliminary proceedings.

ART. 18. The judge of first instance will order the institution of separate proceedings in accordance with the provisions of article 12 of this law.

ART. 19. When the declaration of the prisoner has been taken, if there are sufficient grounds for the accusation, the prosecuting attorney shall draw it up within three days at the most. The case shall be admitted to trial upon a certificate of transfer, which shall be given to the prisoner within the same period (three days).

ART. 20. The prisoner shall, within twenty-four hours at most, appoint an attorney (procurador) and a counsel (abogado) residing in the district or who are there at the time; and in case of his failure to do so, they shall be immediately appointed by the court.

ART. 21. The prosecuting attorney and the prisoner's counsel shall present, within the twenty-four hours following the return of the writs, lists of the witnesses for the prosecution and the defense whose testimony they wish to take. Copies of these lists shall be exchanged by the parties, for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of the witnesses on the day of trial, and for other necessary purposes.

ART. 22. The lists of witnesses shall give the residence, condition, and business of each of the witnesses. Such witnesses as are within 7 leagues or an ordinary day's journey of the court shall be compelled to appear in person, and, also, when, upon the demand of either of the parties, the judge may think his personal appearance indispensable to the prosecution or defense. The other witnesses shall be examined by deposition, in accordance with the provisions of article 7 of the law of September 11, 1820. These same rules shall apply to the ratification of the preliminary proceedings on the part of the witnesses.

ART. 23. The judge shall, as speedily as possible, fix the day for the appearance of the witnesses and for the trial. At the trial each of the witnesses shall be examined separately, with open doors, in the presence of the prosecuting attorney, the prisoner or his attorney, and his counsel. The declarations and ratifications of the witnesses who do not appear in person shall be read with the same solemnity. The declarations shall be signed by those witnesses who can sign their names. If the parties or the prisoner's counsel have any remarks to make to the witnesses at the time when the latter give their testimony, they may do so through the judge; and the questions or remarks and the answers shall be put in writing after the declaration.

ART. 24. Upon the conclusion of this proceeding the prosecuting attorney and the prisoner and his counsel shall present the documentary evidence in their favor, and shall state orally whatever they may think fit, and, without any further proceedings or writings, the judge shall pronounce sentence within three days at most.

ART. 25. When the parties have been notified of the decision, the judge shall summon them to appear within eight days before the Territorial audience, at the same time notifying the prisoner to appoint his attorney and counsel; and if, when that time and two days more shall have elapsed without the appearance of an attorney and a counsel appointed by the prisoner, and residing at the time in the capital, the court shall appoint them officially.

ART. 26. The court shall fix the time for the preparation of papers by the prosecuting attorney, the prisoner's attorney, and the clerk (relator), not more than three days being granted to each.

ART. 27. Within the periods stated in the preceding article the parties may produce before the judge for that week (semanero) such evidence as they may think material and as may be admitted in accordance with the laws.

ART. 28. Upon the expiration of these periods the court (sala) which has jurisdiction, assisted by judges (ministros) of the other courts (salas) to the number of six, including the regent or his substitute, who must always be present, shall proceed immediately to the examination of the cause.

ART. 29. Judgment shall be rendered within three days at most.

ART. 30. The court shall not have any fixed number of hours of session. It shall meet during the day or at night during the whole time, as circumstances may demand.

ART. 31. An absolute majority of the votes shall decide. In case of a tie the decision shall be in conformity with the vote most nearly agreeing with the decision of the judge of first instance; and if it does not absolutely agree with it, the judgment shall be that which is most favorable to the prisoner.

ART. 32. The judgment rendered shall be carried into execution. A judgment of acquittal shall take effect immediately. Sentence of death shall be executed within forty-eight hours; other judgments as speedily as possible.

ART. 33. The periods fixed by this law are peremptory, and can not be extended either by way of suspension, restitution, or in other ways. Nor shall applications for pardon be entertained in any of the prosecutions.

ART. 34. Accomplices in the offenses to which this law relates shall be tried as principals under its provisions.

ART. 35. Cases now pending shall be decided, at whatever stage they may have arrived at the time of the promulgation of this law, so far as relates to their future course, in accordance with the provisions of this law, but without being removed from the courts in which they are being tried.

ART. 36. All laws on this subject shall be regarded as repealed so far as they conflict with the present law.

ART. 37. The provisions of this law are confined to the provinces of the Peninsula and the adjacent islands.

Mr. MORGAN. The case that is here presented is the only one that we have found an opportunity to present upon evidence that we were bound to receive as being authentic and indisputable. Therefore we have progressed as rapidly, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, as we possibly could go in justice to our own character and in justice to our relations with the Government of Spain.

So far as I am concerned, I confess to a greater anxiety personally about this matter, in pressing it to a conclusion, than I have been able to express in any document I was willing to participate in as a report to this body. It is our duty to go firmly and steadfastly and sincerely into the investigation of each of these cases. We have a case now which I may say was reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations, the case of Julio Sanguily, and if we will take that up and dispose of it there will be no difficulty, I think, in reaching other cases hereafter of a like character.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to know whether the report which has been within sixty seconds or thereabouts laid on my desk is the report upon this case?

Mr. MORGAN. It is.

Mr. HOAR. It has just come from the printer. It is a report of 96 pages. I desire to ask the Senator if he does not think the members of the Senate ought to have an opportunity to read the report before they act upon the joint resolution, and that the matter ought to go over long enough to enable us to read it? I never have seen it before.

Mr. MORGAN. I have just stated that the report of the committee is based entirely and exclusively upon Senate Document No. 104, which is made an appendix to the report. That has been on our tables since the 1st day of February. This report relates to nothing else at all but that except to the treaty and to the act of the Spanish Government of 1821, which is referred to in the treaty and also in the report, and of that I now have a copy.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator whether he does not think under the circumstances, if a report like this had come from any other committee whatever, that the Senate should have at least an opportunity to read it? I do not speak now of what it embraces, but here is a new report, stating conclusions and opinions, and quoting treaties. That report occupies 15 pages. I for one feel a very grave responsibility as a Senator in regard to the conduct of the foreign relations of this country. I hope not to be deficient in my duty to the citizens of the country; but it does seem to me that I ought to be accorded the right to read the grounds on which grave international proceedings are put before I am called upon to vote.

Mr. MORGAN. Suggestions of the Senator from Massachusetts always carry with them great weight, and I can not dispute at all the justice of his proposition that Senators should have a chance to read the report before they are called upon to vote upon the joint resolution. But in this case the report is nothing else at all than a mere summarizing of the facts set forth in the Document No. 104, which has been on our tables since the 1st day of February, and which contains the entire case, out of which nothing is excepted and to which nothing is added. It is a mere conclusion of the committee upon this state of facts, and the larger part of the report is made up of quotations from Senate Document 104. It was done for convenience of reference. It was done in order that Senators in running their eyes over the page might find those points distinctly displayed upon which this case hinges entirely.

Now I will proceed to state what the case is, and I will do it very briefly, because it is well understood in the Senate and in the country what the case is. It originated in the arrest of Julio Sanguily on the day before the revolution broke out in Cuba. He was a regularly naturalized citizen of the United States; took his naturalization papers and a passport from this Government to Cuba in 1878 and had them registered in the American consulate there and also in the Captain-Generalcy of Cuba, and from that time on he has kept it renewed. He has kept himself constantly in the presence of the Cuban Government as an American citizen.

Sanguily had been a general, and a very distinguished one, in the former war of rebellion. He was a native of Cuba who had spent some time in the United States, but married in Cuba, as I am informed. I do not know whether he married in Cuba or in the United States, but I am informed that he married in Cuba, raised a family there, had some small amount of property left him after the confiscation of the former revolution, and found it necessary to reside there for the purpose of existing. He has seven very heavy wounds upon his person, received during the previous revolution, and some of those wounds are still in a raw and festering condition. He has now got to be a man past middle age. He has raised his family there in Cuba.

On the day before the revolution broke out, 300 miles away from Habana, he was arrested in his house, in his bathroom, with no persons in the house but his wife and children, and without any arms or ammunition whatever in the house. He was taken immediately to jail, and at 11 o'clock at night, either that night or some subsequent night, he was put through the inquisition of an examination by a military officer, without the presence of counsel or witnesses, or any person to guide him, and a record was made of his statement, in all of which he denied any complicity at all in the present revolution. Sanguily admitted upon his examination in open court afterwards, as he admitted, no doubt, upon that secret examination (which nobody has ever seen except the officers who took it and the court that tried Sanguily; he has never seen it) that an overture had been made to him to engage in the present rebellion, which he refused absolutely to participate in. The man had some recollections of what he had suffered before. His wounds would have kept him out of active service; his age would have prohibited him from going into the military service of Cuba; and while doubtless his sympathies have been always the same, he had given no expression to them. The Spanish Government has not been able to produce one word said by him to any human being except in reply to communications received by him or personal communications made to him in an overture to go into the rebellion, which he absolutely refused to do. He was made incommunicando—that is to say, he was put in solitary imprisonment.

Immediately our consul-general, upon being informed of it, within a day after his incarceration, demanded that his trial should proceed in accordance with the civil laws of Spain, that law which I have here, the act of 1821. That demand was based upon our treaty of 1795, which subsequently was modified by other provisions of other treaties, but finally was expounded in a declaration made between Mr. Cushing and Senor Calderón y Collantes on the 12th day of January, 1877.

I will state the occasion for that protocol, as it was called. It was a declaration on the part of the ministers of both Governments. During the previous revolution, which was then just drawing to a close, many American citizens had been arrested and confined and condemned and shot under circumstances that gave great irritation to the people of the United States. The Spanish Government planted itself upon its right to try these cases in any way that it saw proper, and insisted that the Government of the United States had no authority and no right to interfere, no matter what supposed injustice might be done to their citizens on the trial of the cases. Thereupon Mr. Cushing brought this subject forward and an agreement was entered into mutually between the two Governments in this protocol, which prescribed the right of subjects of Spain in the United States and citizens of the United States within the Spanish dominions to trial, under certain stipulations, which are here contained.

Now I will read the Spanish part of those stipulations:

Señor Calderon y Collantes declared as follows:

1. No citizen of the United States residing in Spain, her adjacent islands, or her ultramarine possessions, charged with acts of sedition, treason, or conspiracy against the institutions, the public security, the integrity of the territory or against the Supreme Government, or any other crime whatsoever, shall be subject to trial by any exceptional tribunal, but exclusively by the ordinary jurisdiction, except in the case of being captured with arms in hand.

Mr. Sanguily does not fall within that exception, because he was captured in his bathroom and without any arms in his hands or about his house or anywhere else, and that is admitted.

2. Those who, not coming within this last case, may be arrested or imprisoned, shall be deemed to have been so arrested or imprisoned by order of the civil authority for the effects of the law of April 17, 1821—

Which I have now before me—

even though the arrest or imprisonment shall have been effected by armed force.

3. Those who may be taken with arms in hand, and who are therefore comprehended in the exception of the first article, shall be tried by ordinary council of war, in conformity with the second article of the hereinbefore-mentioned law—

That does not apply to Sanguily—

but even in this case the accused shall enjoy for their defense the guarantees embodied in the aforesaid law of April 17, 1821.

4. In consequence whereof, as well in the cases mentioned in the third paragraph as in those of the second, the parties accused are allowed to name attorneys and advocates, who shall have access to them at suitable times; they shall be furnished in due season with a copy of the accusation and a list of witnesses for the prosecution, which latter shall be examined before the presumed criminal, his attorney and advocate, in conformity with the provisions of articles 20 to 31 of the said law; they shall have the right to compel the witnesses of whom they desire to avail themselves to appear and give testimony or to do it by means of depositions; they shall present such evidence as they may judge proper; and they shall be permitted to be present and to make their defense, in public trial, orally or in writing, by themselves or by means of their counsel.

5. The sentence pronounced shall be referred to the audiencia of the judicial district, or to the Captain-General, according as the trial may have taken place before the ordinary judge or before the council of war, in conformity also with what is prescribed in the above-mentioned law.

The act of 1821, in article 37, the last article in the act, provides as follows:

The provisions of this law are confined to the provinces of the peninsula and adjacent islands.

That law when it was enacted had no application to Cuba, but this treaty took up this Spanish law that applies entirely to the peninsula and the adjacent islands, and made the law a part of the right of the treaty, referred to it expressly by date, and its provisions also, and made it expressly a part of the treaty.

The first complaint which was made by our Government, made immediately, was that Sanguily had been arrested by the military power, placed in solitary confinement, was not permitted to communicate with counsel or with any person else for as much as twelve days, and even after that he was not permitted to do it; and that he therefore had no opportunity to prepare for his defense in the methods prescribed by this treaty engagement with the United States.

The next objection made was that the court before whom he was summoned was a court consisting of five judges, when this law and the treaty provide for a court of six judges, the audiencia before whom the case should be removed after it had been tried by a civil tribunal.

The next objection made was that he was not permitted to have bail. He was permitted to have what they call bail in Cuba; that is to say, he was permitted, in order to save his property from confiscation, to give a bond in $10,000 for the security of the costs of the prosecution. He was not able to give that bond, and of course what little property he had—he had not much—was subject to confiscation for the purpose of paying the costs of that trial as it proceeded.

Now, just at that point, as to the organization of this court, as to the method of proceeding, as to locking this man in solitary confinement, and in forbidding him to converse with any person whatever for this period of time, and for a much longer period in fact than I have stated, here now the Government of the United States interposed the objection that that court had no jurisdiction of Sanguily because they proceeded contrary to the treaty. That question, instead of being decided by the political Government of Spain, was submitted by the prosecuting attorney of that Government to Cuba, to the decision of the court, and the court decided that they had the right to proceed notwithstanding the treaty, that a later law enacted for Cuba in Spain had overruled the act of 1821 and had repealed it; that it had substituted it, and thereby had repealed that much of the treaty, was the assertion.

That left the question on the part of the Spanish Government entirely in the hands of the Spanish authorities, without consulting the Government of the United States in any way whatever. That is the first point that is made.

Mr. Sanguily was kept in prison there with many delays, without being granted the trial provided in the act of 1821, which prescribed that he should have a trial within a limited number of days. He was kept in prison upon one pretense and another for a long period of time—as much as three months. Thereupon the Government of Spain instituted, while he was in prison, another proceeding against him for kidnaping, and put him through the same course of examination, put him incommunicado, shut him up in a dungeon, locked him up, kept everybody from communicating with him, had a new case against him entirely, and in that case they put upon him a bond of $20,000 to pay the costs of the prosecution. Our Government again interposed, and by the most vigorous and solemn protest in respect to this second arrest—or, rather, not an arrest, but the second prosecution, for he was already in a dungeon at that time—demanded that the proceedings in that case also should be conducted according to this treaty and according to the law of 1821. Spain absolutely refused to do it. They held on to that case against Sanguily—the kidnaping case—until after his conviction for rebellion, and thereupon the court nolled that case; they quashed the proceeding and dismissed it entirely. They were never able to find the slightest color of evidence against him on the subject of kidnaping, and it is not only fair to assume, but we are compelled to assume, that that case was piled upon the back of the other for the purpose merely of detaining him in prison after he should have been acquitted upon the other case, thus taking an American citizen and piling upon him accusation after accusation, contrary to the treaty, and holding him for trial under these accusations.

Finally, after many delays and many protestations on the part of the Government of the United States at the delays which had taken place, and which were entirely unnecessary, they came down to the point of time, in November, 1896, when they were willing to put this case on trial. They fixed a day for the trial ten days distant from the notice which they issued through the official paper.

Up to that time the charges against Sanguily, although often demanded, had never been furnished by the Government of Spain. The Government of the United States up to that time was in total ignorance of what the charges were, except from the general newspaper current reports about them. Sanguily and his counsel having demanded the charges, were refused; the Government of the United States having demanded the charges, that demand was refused.

Finally he got a notice that they had concluded to try him. Upon that trial no evidence was given which in the slightest degree, in my opinion, tends to implicate Mr. Sanguily. The whole of the proceedings in that case is spread in the record, and they are set forth in this report, and Senators can read it here if they choose to do so. It is not a lengthy proceeding, but it contains all that was said to have occurred in that trial, and our consul certifies it to the Government of the United States as a full presentation of what occurred on that trial.

Testimony was read on that trial and received by the court which was not sworn to, reports of officials, police officials, military authorities, were read upon that trial against Sanguily which had never been sworn to, and those reports were not based upon actual statements of fact within the knowledge, or which purported to be within the knowledge, of the reporting officer, but upon information which he had derived from various sources which he did not disclose. Even those reports do not implicate Sanguily.

One part of the case consisted of this state of facts: It appears from the testimony that Sanguily had not been to New York since 1878. He was accused of being a member of the committee here which was conducting the war against Cuba, which he denied. He had never been to New York. A man by the name of Azcuy came from Cuba to the United States, and in parting with his son in Florida, as he testified, he received a commission as a colonel in the Cuban army. It is strongly to be inferred from the testimony, as it is stated in this trial, that his object in getting the commission was not to enter the military service of Cuba, but, as he was a sugar planter there, to protect himself against the raids of the Cubans if they should come in upon him. He stated that that commission was handed to him by his son, a young man in Florida, about the time he was leaving on the boat to go to Cuba. When he arrived in Cuba, the officers searched him, and in his cravat they found this commission. He tore it up, put part of it in his mouth, and chewed it up, but another part of it was recovered. It is impossible for the experts to determine, so they testified, from that paper what it was that it contained, but it carries upon its face a mere suspicion that it was a commission to this man Azcuy as a colonel in the Cuban army. There is a part of a name attached to that piece of mutilated and torn paper which would spell out the last four or five letters in Sanguily's name, but the number of Sanguilys that are in Cuba nobody knows. That is a very common name there, as it is here. Mr. Sanguily denied that he had ever seen Azcuy; that he had ever known such a man; that he had ever heard of him; that he had any knowledge of him. He denied the issuance of that paper, and said that it was not in his handwriting; and yet that was put in evidence against him. Now, it is utterly impossible that that man, going from the United States to Habana with that paper in his pocket, could have received it from Sanguily, for he had never seen him, never knew him, had no connection with him. Sanguily says he never prepared any paper of that kind; that he had no authority to do it; that he was not in the rebellion, and had no connection with it officially or otherwise. It is upon that paper and upon the reports of those officers that Sanguily was convicted.

The witness who brought the message to Sanguily inviting him to join in the rebellion, whose name was Coloma, says that he did not see Sanguily; that he had no communication with him; that when he saw Betancourt, Betancourt informed him that Sanguily was not going in with the movement, and therefore he did not see him, and had no communication with him. That was the witness who was relied upon by the Government of Spain to connect Sanguily with this rebellion; that a message had been brought to him; that he had correspondence with the men engaged in the rebellion, and that through that correspondence he became involved in the rebellion. The man testified, and entirely denied having seen Sanguily, or having known him. He said he had probably seen him on one occasion, but denied having any acquaintance with him, or having any connection with him at all. That man, in making that denial, confessed his own guilt; he acknowledged that he brought a message to Betancourt, and delivered it to him. That was enough, of course, to fix him; and after Sanguily's first trial that man was shot in prison. Coloma was shot in the Spanish prison, doubtless executed because of his complicity in the rebellion. That was, as I say, after Sanguily's first trial. When the second trial came on, Coloma was not present, of course, to exonerate Sanguily, and Sanguily lost the benefit of his testimony.

The first trial was had. An appeal was taken from the judgment and sentence of the court, which was life imprisonment in chains, to the supreme court at Madrid. That case was reversed by the supreme court at Madrid, but upon what ground is not stated in any of these proceedings, except that Consul-General Lee said he was informed it was upon the merits of the case; that there was not sufficient evidence found in the records to convict Sanguily. In another place it is said that it was a reversal upon some technical ground. At all events, the case was reversed and sent back for trial in Cuba. The proceedings went on, and a demand was made for an immediate trial of Sanguily or else for his release. It was made in those words by the Government of the United States through its consul-general.

I am moving over the surface of the testimony in a very general and discursive way, because I do not intend this morning to enter into particular detail of the facts. They are set forth in the report which I have submitted to the Senate, and also in the exhibits to the report, Senate Document No. 104.

When the second trial came on, it was witnessed by our vice-consul, Mr. Springer, who, in a dispatch to our Government, gives a full statement of all that occurred on that trial.

Now, I undertake to say that on either of those trials, or on both of them, there were two manifestations—one was extreme hatred toward the Government of the United States, in which the counsel for the Government of Spain indulged in his diatribe before the court, and the other was the absence of any evidence to convict Sanguily of any complicity in the rebellion.

An appeal was taken to Madrid from the last decree or judgment, which was followed by the same sentence as the former, life imprisonment in chains, and that case is pending, we suppose, in Madrid now.

On this brief statement of the case, the question arises, What right has the United States to interfere here? Can the United States interfere upon the general ground that there has been a false trial and a judgment obtained either by corrupt testimony or unauthorized testimony or illegal testimony, or testimony which is insufficient? If we could put the case upon that solitary ground, there would be ample reason for the resolution which the Committee on Foreign Relations has reported to this body, because there was never, I will undertake to say, in the history of jurisprudence any case where there was less show of reason for the conviction of the defendant. But we go upon higher ground than that, the ground that we have the undoubted right and the duty of interfering.

Now, what is that? It is that in these trials, from beginning to end, notwithstanding the protestations that were made on the trials, at the time of the trials, and by our consul-general in the intermediate period, the intervals between the trials, the Government of Spain insisted on trying this man under the rules which apply in Cuba, under statutes that exist there later than the act of 1821, and utterly ignored and discarded all of the rights of this American citizen under that treaty.

So the case as presented here is as much a case of an international sort and depends as much upon international right as if the Spanish Government had fired into an innocent merchantman upon the high seas. The treaty rights of the United States have been grossly violated, frequently violated, defiantly violated in this proceeding, and there is nothing to be inferred or ltaken from the fact that it is a judicial proceeding there, or in the nature of a judicial proceeding, because that court had not the jurisdiction to try this man in the manner and form he was tried or before the court which tried him.

This, Mr. President, presents the general outline of this case. Other Senators will be heard upon this subject in more detail than I feel at liberty to indulge in this morning, particularly as the views which I have had the honor to present are set forth in the report which I submitted to the Senate on yesterday.

I wish to make, Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Perhaps the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] will concur in my view of it. I wish to know whether I have the right to move to substitute the joint resolution reported by the committee for the concurrent resolution of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not do that. I am in favor of both resolutions.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama repeat what he proposes?

Mr. MORGAN. I inquired of the Chair if it was competent, in the present situation of the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska, for me to offer the joint resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations as a substitute for his concurrent resolution. It was a parliamentary inquiry merely.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not do that, for if he does it will place some of us in an awkward attitude. I am in favor of the joint resolution reported by the Senator and want to vote for it, but I can not vote for it as a substitute for my resolution. Why not let it be added as an amendment to the pending resolution?

Mr. MILLS. As a substitute.

Mr. ALLEN. Not as a substitute. I know what I am talking about.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will answer the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Alabama, if he desires an answer.

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have no hesitation in entertaining the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WHITE. What is the request, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] makes the parliamentary inquiry whether he may offer the joint resolution he has indicated as a substitute, as the Chair understood the Senator, for the concurrent resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. The Chair will entertain the motion, if that motion is made.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to incur the antagonism of any Senator on the floor to the joint resolution reported by the committee by any motion which I might make here. It is a very delicate subject and one of very serious importance, and I do not feel warranted in interposing my own personal judgment in the direction of that matter; but I appeal to the Senator from Nebraska to allow the joint resolution to pass, as it will not hinder his resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I am perfectly willing that my resolution may be laid aside temporarily to pass this joint resolution. I will go further, and say that I am perfectly willing to have my joint resolution go to the Committee on Foreign Relations if they will take it up and consider it and report on it one way or another in a short time.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the Senator that I will urge it before the committee, and I think there will be no reluctance in considering it.

Mr. ALLEN. If I can have any assurance that the resolution will not be strangled in the Committee on Foreign Relations, but will be reported favorably or adversely, I shall be content to have it referred to that committee.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Nebraska can have the pledge of every Senator who is now on the floor connected with that committee that his resolution will be promptly considered and reported.

Mr. ALLEN. Then let my resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

JULIO SANGUILY.

Mr. MORGAN. Now I ask for the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 207) demanding the release of Julio Sanguily, an American citizen imprisoned in Cuba.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution has heretofore been read at length.

Mr. PETTIGREW and Mr. DANIEL addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the admirable statement of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has so clearly presented this case that I hesitate to say anything; and if the body of the Senate were as familiar with the record as the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations I should be perfectly content to leave the matter in the attitude in which he has placed it. But as some Senators have not read this record, and as few can be aware of the enormity of the proceedings of the Spanish Government and the Spanish authorities in Cuba against a citizen of our country, I hope I shall not trespass too much upon the patience of the Senate if I call attention to the fact that his imprisonment has long been declared to be illegal by the Executive Government of the United States, and that the entire proceeding against him is in direct violation of our treaty with Spain.

Two years ago on yesterday, Mr. President, this man Julio Sanguily was arrested by soldiers in Cuba, and for two years he has languished, sick and sore and wounded, in the Cabanas fortress in Habana. He has been held in military bondage. He has been tried by military procedure in part, and it is so clear that the proceedings against him have been illegal that the very statement of the text of the law and the facts would carry conviction to any human mind.

After considerable delay, he was given a trial in Cuba. It was by a proceeding partly military and partly civil, in which military testimony, ex parte testimony, hearsay testimony, unsworn testimony, was heard against him. So arbitrary were these proceedings of the Spanish authorities that, after the usual delays which have attended all of those proceedings, an appeal was taken. The trial was set aside, as we are told by our consul, although we have no copy of the appellate record, on the ground that the testimony against him was insufficient.

After more delay he had a new trial in December last, nearly two years after his arrest. His trial again was partly military and partly civil, and he was for the second time condemned to perpetual imprisonment in chains.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the report which has just come to our hands leaves in a great deal of obscurity some matters which are necessary for the understanding of this question, and I should like, at some time convenient, to put to the Senator from Virginia, who we all know to be a very able lawyer, one or two inquiries about the details of this case. Perhaps I had better not do it now, as I see he is making a connected statement, but before he sits down, after he has finished his connected statement, I wish he would permit me to put a question or two to him.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall be glad then to try to answer any question the Senator may propound.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not interrupt the Senator now.

Mr. DANIEL. I think the views of our consul, set forth in detail, and to which I shall presently refer, will satisfactorily answer any pertinent inquiry.

Again, Mr. President, an appeal has been taken to the court of cassation, at Madrid; but in the meantime this man is wounded, sick, and in prison. He has been treated rigorously, harshly, cruelly, and brutally. The manner in which he has been treated is a disgrace to this century and to civilization. He has been made at times incommunicado, as stated by the Senator from Alabama—that is, put in solitary confinement—itself a penalty inflicted upon him before trial.

A copy of the proceedings under which he was held was not furnished promptly, was not furnished reasonably. On the contrary, we find our consul, as late as August 27, 1895, reporting to our State Department that the lower court in Cuba has refused to the advocates of Aguirre and Sanguily even a view of the proceedings taken against them.

After his condemnation and imprisonment for life in perpetual chains, a copy of the proceedings of the court was asked for by our consul. It was refused once; it was refused again; it was refused thrice. Our consul then asked that he might be permitted to take a copy of the proceedings of the court. He presented a request from the Government of the United States that he, their representative, might be permitted to take a copy of the proceedings by which our fellow-countryman was held. For the fourth time this privilege was denied.

More than this, Mr. President, our representative in Cuba has been arrogantly insulted by the Spanish authorities; and not only has he in his person been insulted by the Spanish authorities, but this country has been insulted by them and he has been told by a Spanish officer high in authority, to whom he made a most polite and courteous appeal, that his conduct in presenting this intervention in favor of Sanguily, by order of our State Department, was a disgrace to the United States and to the American flag.

Now, Mr. President, this consul of the United States, Mr. Ramon O. Williams, has acted with so much discretion, so much energy in the general conduct of his defense of American prisoners in Cuba that I hesitate to make any sort of criticism upon him, and yet I deem it not unfit to say that if at that time he had demanded his passports to this country, and if a fleet had been sent to demand an apology from the Spanish Government for this insult to our representative and to our flag, I do not believe there is a single citizen in the United States who would not have rejoiced that it had been done.

There is a voluminous correspondence here. There are more than eighty letters, covering a period of two long years, many telegrams, and much diplomatic correspondence. If red tape would save a citizen of this country from brutal imprisonment, there has been enough red tape used in this case to build a cable between America and Spain, and if printer's ink were of any effect, there has been enough of it used to make an ocean for the cable to be laid in.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to ask him a question? I take it that the object of this joint resolution——

Mr. DANIEL. I will yield to a question, but I do not want to yield to the argument of the Senator just now.

Mr. HALE. Assuming that the object of the joint resolution is the release of Sanguily—I understand that is the purport of it; I did not hear it read, but I understand that is the object of it——

Mr. DANIEL. That is the purport of it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is just now speaking of the red tape that has been resorted to in this matter. Now, let me ask him to state, if he has not already done so—I was called into the Committee on Appropriations, and have not heard all that he said or that the Senator from Alabama said—whether this whole matter has been the subject of direct negotiations conducted diplomatically between the State Department and the Spanish Government for the purpose of securing the release of Sanguily; and if that be true, has that fact come before the Committee on Foreign Relations? If so, and if this subject-matter, which is rather in the domain of negotiation than of legislation, has been taken up by our State Department faithfully, will the Senator tell the Senate what has been the result? Is it not a fact that at the present moment the Department has conducted negotiations to such an extent that it is expecting the release of Sanguily by the Spanish Government within a few days? Has not that information come directly to the committee within a few days?

Mr. DANIEL. No; it has not come to me.

Mr. HALE. Has there been no communication from the Secretary of State to the committee, stating that as a result of the negotiations it is expected that Sanguily will be released through the ordinary methods of diplomacy within a few days?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. DANIEL. None within my knowledge.

Mr. LODGE. None.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator, then, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], if he is here, whether he has not a letter from the Secretary of State covering that point?

Mr. DANIEL. I must decline to yield to the Senator to furnish him information, which he could easily get at the State Department or by reading this record, on a point which is not pertinent to the course of my remarks.

Mr. HALE. The Senator must remember that the Committee on Foreign Relations, a great committee, is the organ of this body, and that we——

Mr. DANIEL. I am not bound to yield my time on the floor because the Committee on Foreign Relations is an organ of this body.

Mr. HALE. And that we must rely upon it for facts.

Mr. DANIEL. I am the organ of the State which I in part represent, and when I get through, which will be within a very short period of time, I will yield to any organ that desires to be heard by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I will not take up any more time, simply saying——

Mr. DANIEL. Whether it is the organ of the governor-general of Cuba or of the Queen of Spain or of anybody else.

Mr. HALE. We have our own views upon this subject.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not mean to say anything that may be at all offensive to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator does not. I could say something offensive if I wanted to.

Mr. DANIEL. I could not say anything offensive to him even if I desired.

Mr. HALE. Before this subject is ended—and it will not be ended in one hour or in two days—I hope the committee will put the Senate in possession of what the State Department has been doing to secure the release of Sanguily, if that is the object of the joint resolution.

Mr. DANIEL. I will answer the Senator from Maine; and I beg him not to think that just a little byword of badinage is meant to be offensive, and that I could under any circumstances say anything offensive to him.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has not offended me in the least.

Mr. DANIEL. The State Department has been dealing with this matter diplomatically for two years, and two years is long enough for this country to get a citizen of the United States out of prison when it itself has claimed to the Government holding him that he is illegally there. I will presently read to the Senator from Maine the dispatches from the State Department directing that the illegality of Sanguily's imprisonment be called to the attention of the Spanish authorities, and that exception be taken to its proceedings, and if there is not some one who prompts action in this matter I am afraid that another year or two years may pass before this man is released.

Mr. GRAY. If I do not interrupt the Senator, I will state to him that I have just this moment seen an Associated Press dispatch that the counsel of Sanguily has withdrawn his appeal in order to facilitate the matter of his release by pardon.

Mr. DANIEL. I am unwilling that an American citizen illegally detained shall be subjected to any condition. It is a humiliation to this country to submit to any condition when the power of another country is exercised to detain illegally the humblest of its citizens.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to make a single observation?

Mr. DANIEL. And if Sanguily, despairing of action on the part of the United States, has submitted himself to the tyranny of an odious Government and has been compelled by sickness, by poverty, by delay, and by the failure of his own Government to defend him, as he is entitled to be defended, it is a humiliation to the country that he has been compelled to withdraw the appeal as a condition of his liberty; and if I represented this country in any place in which I could act with authority, I should telegraph Sanguily not to withdraw his appeal, but to stand upon his rights as an American citizen, and that there are enough people in this country who do respect those rights to see that he shall not longer be detained in a Spanish fortress.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator just there let me read a dispatch? It is entirely as the Senator pleases.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. It reads:

HABANA, February 25.

Señor Mesa Dominguez, counsel for Julio Sanguily, has filed in the Habana court papers withdrawing the appeal to the supreme court of justice of Madrid made against the Habana criminal court condemning Sanguily to imprisonment for life.

So that under the advice of counsel Sanguily has withdrawn his appeal and stands ready to be pardoned. An American citizen has the right to do that.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me?

Mr. DANIEL. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. If the counsel for Sanguily has done that, he has done an exceedingly wicked and unjust act toward his client.

Mr. HALE. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. FRYE. I know it from this fact: Sanguily has been convicted of a crime, the punishment for which is imprisonment in chains for life. He has now appealed to Madrid, and if that appeal is withdrawn it is a confession of the crime, and judgment follows. The only condition that Spain has made in relation to the release of this man has been that it could not pardon him until he was a sentenced criminal, which is the law of all nations.

Mr. HALE. Suppose pardon follows?

Mr. FRYE. Beg pardon. One moment. If his counsel has withdrawn the appeal, then that man is a convicted criminal, liable to punishment, to imprisonment for life, and can only escape it by pardon, and if he escapes by pardon then he loses for himself and family all claims whatever for damages against Spain. That is what Spain has been contending for all the time.

Now we contend, on the other hand, that the man has been unjustly convicted; that he has not been treated according to his treaty rights; that he has been treated against international law, and that Spain must deliver him up to us; and if I had my way a ship of war would start forthwith to Habana and deliver him. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to remind the occupants of the galleries——

Mr. HALE. That tells the story.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine will suspend. The Chair desires to remind the occupants of the galleries that a repetition of this offense will result in the galleries being cleared. The Chair desires to have the Sergeant-at-Arms see that that order is executed. This is the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MILLS. The galleries are filled with American people, and they have a right to express their sentiments on this question.

Mr. HALE. My colleague has told the whole story. It is not desired to release this man, but what is desired is war.

Mr. DANIEL. When the Senator gets through——

Mr. HALE. That is what the Senator wants; that is what is desired; but I tell the Senator and the rest of the Senators that this country will not be driven to war in the next seven days, not if I can help it.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question as to a fact?

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed. I do not like to be cut up in my argument. However, I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. It will be a very quiet question, and it is in regard to the matter of citizenship. We get our information from the report on this subject. Now, I wish to put this question for information simply, and I should like to have the attention of every Senator, if we may have quiet in the Senate. I beg the Senator from Virginia kindly to listen to the question. I want to get into a condition of a little less heat, if possible. Here is the report of the committee:

Sanguily was registered in Cuba as an American citizen on the 22d of August, 1878, on a passport issued by the United States on the 7th of August, 1878. He then resided in Habana until his arrest, on the 24th of February, 1895.

That is the report. Now, what does Sanguily say? This is a question which in my humble judgment is of very great importance indeed. He says he has been a citizen of the United States since 1889.

Mr. WHITE. What page is that?

Mr. DANIEL. That may mean 1879.

Mr. HOAR. 1889 is what it says.

Mr. DANIEL. It is possible it may be a misprint.

Mr. HOAR. So, is it not true that this gentleman's citizenship is a pretended and not a real citizenship; that he resided in Habana during the time when he must have had five years' residence here, and after having taken out original papers and got naturalized? He resided there at the time of his naturalization, and he has resided there ever since. Now, that is what you report to us.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I beg leave to state——

Mr. HOAR. Where is your citizenship?

Mr. DANIEL. When the Senator will yield to me for the purpose——

Mr. HOAR. I am through.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state that throughout these proceedings it is recognized and acknowledged that Sanguily is an American citizen.

Mr. HOAR. Where?

Mr. DANIEL. I can not read all the papers while I am upon my feet.

Mr. FRYE. In the communication to-day from Mr. De Lôme.

Mr. DANIEL. In a communication to-day, which recognizes him as an American citizen.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Virginia will allow me, I will state that it is acknowledged by the Spanish minister himself.

Mr. DANIEL. It is acknowledged not only by the Spanish minister in his correspondence, but it was acknowledged by the prosecutor at the bar in his trial.

Mr. HOAR. But Sanguily says he is not, and the committee reports that during these whole seventeen years he has dwelt in Habana, when he must have dwelt here five years to be a citizen.

Mr. DANIEL. An American citizen can reside where he pleases.

Mr. HOAR. Not during the preliminary stage. He must reside five years in this country.

Mr. DANIEL. He is registered as an American citizen on the list with our consulate at Habana. He had a passport as an American citizen from our Secretary of State. He had a passport as an American citizen from the governor-general of Cuba. He was recognized as an American citizen, and prosecuted as such by the prosecutor at the bar when he was tried. He is treated and called an American citizen in all of this correspondence.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me? The express declaration is this: The passport is dated 1878, and nobody pretends that he made his original application or left Cuba until 1879.

Mr. DANIEL. I have satisfied my mind that Julio Sanguily is an American citizen if this record be true. The State Department has satisfied itself that Sanguily is an American citizen and has twice made demand in the name of this Government upon Spain either to try him or to release him, because he is an American citizen. So I do not feel called upon at this hour to go behind the action of the Department of State and the Spanish minister and the Cuban authorities and the American consul and the court in which he was tried.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate by going into the minutiæ of the case, but I wish to call attention to the fact that these proceedings have been treated as illegal by our own Government. If the Senator from Massachusetts will turn to the letter of our consul he will see that he states in his protest against the trial of Sanguily——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator read the second paragraph of the letter, on page 2?

Mr. DANIEL. The consul protests against—

All proceedings hitherto practiced in this case, or that hereafter may be practiced in this case by the court-martial now trying this American citizen, because they are in clear contradiction of the said agreement between the two nations.

This was done in pursuance of telegrams from Assistant Secretary Uhl of March 16, 1895. I beg the Senator to turn——

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator referring to the letter of December 17?

Mr. DANIEL. I have not the reference to the page. I will give it to the Senator, if he will wait a little.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator referring to the letter of the consul of December 17?

Mr. DANIEL. It is a letter in answer to the telegram of Mr. Uhl of March 16, 1895, page 12 of the record.

Mr. HALE. Page 12 of the report?

Mr. DANIEL. Page 12 of the report.

We have under date of May 7, 1895, from Vice-Consul Springer the following to our State Department:

With further reference to the case of Julio Sanguily, I have now the honor to transmit herewith copy and translation of a communication from his excellency the segundo cabo (Acting Captain-General), dated the 6th instant, in answer to the communication of this office of the 25th ultimo, which contained a solemn protest against the subjection of Mr. Sanguily for a second time to a military court and his being put "incomunicado," or into solitary confinement, from the 24th of April, pending such military inquiry, despite the decree of Governor-General Calleja, of March 16, inhibiting or waiving military jurisdiction.

While professing the desire to scrupulously comply with the terms of the protocol between the United States and Spain of January 12, 1877, it will be observed that this Government sees no impropriety of holding an American citizen subject to a military jurisdiction pending inquiry and investigation for proofs to be used against him and furnishing copies of the same upon transfer of his case to a civil court of ordinary jurisdiction for trial. It claims there is no essential difference between military procedure or indictment and the actual trial of the case.

That is the report of our vice-consul-general. Now, here is Mr. Uhl's reply from the State Department, dated Washington, May 21, 1895:

Carillo's case, involving most important principle, has been presented by United States minister to Spain. In cases of Aguirre and Sanguily you will file formal protest declining to recognise validity of military jurisdiction in preliminary stage.

Then Mr. Uhl goes on to state to our consul the grounds of this protest.

The treaty of 1795—

He says—

excludes the exercise of military jurisdiction altogether and requires arrests to be made and offenses proceeded against by ordinary jurisdiction only. Protocol—

Referring to the protocol of the Collantes-Cushing agreement of 1877—

The treaty of 1795 excludes the exercise of military jurisdiction altogether and requires arrests to be made and offenses proceeded against by ordinary jurisdiction only. Protocol merely recognizes, declares, and explains this treaty right. Military arm has no judicial cognizance over our citizens at any stage. Even arrest, when made by military power, is by a conventional figment deemed to have been a civil act. By no fiction can proceedings of military judge instructor be deemed the act of an ordinary court of first instance. Assumption of such cognizance in Aguirre case and rearrest of Sanguily, after submission to civil court, apparently for mere purpose of asserting military jurisdiction in summary proceedings, were an exercise of functions against which you will enter protest, reserving all rights of this Government and its citizens in the premises.

This protest was formally made by Mr. Springer. All the rights of our Government and of its citizens were reserved from a period dating from May 21, 1895.

Mr. President, I would next call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to a part of the protest as made by Mr. Springer to the governor-general of Cuba. It is dated May 25, 1895, and will be found on page 18 of the record, and specifically carries out the instructions of our consul.

I beg leave now also to call attention to the letter of Mr. Uhl to Mr. Springer, dated Department of State, Washington, June 8, 1895.

Mr. PLATT. May I interrupt the Senator from Virginia for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. DANIEL. I yield for a question.

Mr. PLATT. In one of the documents, the register of naturalized citizens, it is said that Sanguily was naturalized in 1878. In the record of his trial and his confession, as it is claimed, he said he was naturalized in 1889. Is there any explanation of that?

Mr. DANIEL. I presume it is a misprint. I noticed that.

Mr. PLATT. Is there any explanation of that discrepancy?

Mr. MORGAN. This matter has been drawn into controversy here, and it is perfectly susceptible of explanation and statement. Mr. Williams, on the 27th day of February, 1895, sent this dispatch to Mr. Uhl:

On reaching the office the next morning I found that Mr. Julio Sanguily is registered in this consulate-general as an American citizen on a certificate of naturalization issued to him on the 6th of August, 1878, by the superior court of New York, and passport 9310 of the Department of State, dated the 7th of same month and year, and also upon the personal document issued to him on the 23d of the same month and year by the government-general of this island.

Mr. HALE. What is the date when he was naturalized?

Mr. PLATT. 1878.

Mr. LODGE. The 6th of August, 1878.

Mr. MORGAN. August 6, 1878.

Mr. HALE. Could he have been for five years a resident of the United States before that?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know about that.

Mr. HOAR. He must have been within the United States for five years.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the second paragraph of the letter of Mr. Lee to Mr. Rockhill, on page 2, in which he says:

Sanguily had proved himself a very brave and efficient officer in the Cuban war from 1868 to 1878——

Mr. HALE. Then he was naturalized.

Mr. VILAS—

and had been wounded seven times.

How, with that record behind him, could he have been naturalized in 1878 unless it was fraudulently done?

Mr. HALE. When the statute declares that he must have five years' residence in the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I object. I am speaking by the indulgence of the Senator from Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Virginia to yield to the Senator from Alabama. Is that correct?

Mr. DANIEL. I will do so, though I was not aware that I had done so. I yield to the Senator from Alabama very cheerfully.

Mr. MORGAN. I have read now from the dispatch which sets forth the fact stated in this report. On the trial of this case and after the trial the Government of the United States attempted to get a certified copy of the proceedings, and the Spanish Government refused to deliver it to the Government of the United States.

Therefore Mr. Williams was compelled to resort to the official report of that case, to the trial of the case as it was printed, in the Spanish papers in Cuba; and it is in that report that this statement comes that he had been a citizen of the United States since 1889. That report is taken from the newspapers. It is all the evidence the Government could get as to what was stated; but there it was stated by Sanguily, and it was stated in his confession. Now, what confession? The confession that was made at 11 o'clock at night before a military officer in his dungeon, contrary to the treaty. Whether we got it right or whether we got it wrong nobody knows.

Mr. HOAR. But that is not the whole point, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not arguing the point; I am merely stating the fact.

Mr. DANIEL. I hope I may be permited to proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I think I have imposed upon the Senator's good nature more than I should have done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DANIEL. When I was interrupted by another inquiry, which was not at all pertinent to the course of my thought, I was about to read a letter of Assistant Secretary Uhl, June 18, 1895, to Vice-Consul Springer, in which he says:

On May 6 Sanguily was still in military prison, his transfer to civil jurisdiction being promised as soon as military proceedings could be copied. If not yet transferred, you will demand that military imprisonment cease forthwith and that he be speedily given civil trial on charges preferred by civil process or else released. Telegram sent you May 21 and your protest thereunder make clear the refusal of this Government to recognize military jurisdiction in first instance.

My comment upon that letter is simply this: Here was a formal action on the part of the United States, following a protest by a demand. It was an instruction to our consul to make peremptory demand upon the Cuban authorities, in June, 1895, either to proceed immediately and promptly to try Sanguily by civil process or release him. What respect Spain paid to that demand of the United States may be well imagined when I read another letter from the Department of State, from Assistant Secretary Adee to Mr. Williams, dated September 3, 1895. The months of July and August had passed after this peremptory demand. Mr. Adee says:

In view of protracted delay in Sanguily case, of disregard of petition preferred by him on suggestion of authorities that it will secure his release, and of acquittal of Gerardo Portela, jointly accused with him of kidnapping, the Department feels compelled—to demand his immediate trial or release.

Just exactly what it had done two months and a half before. This demand was treated in the same dilatory manner that other demands had been treated. After this demand steps were taken to send to Spain to get depositions. Finally, after nine months' delay, and after the United States had protested against his trial in this mongrel, military-civil fashion, he was tried and condemned after the manner that they had protested against, being condemned to life imprisonment in chains on December 5, 1895.

About the time of that trial and condemnation the Senate of the United States passed resolutions, offered by the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], calling for all correspondence relating to the trial, conviction, and sentence to hard labor for life of Julio Sanguily, an American citizen, and directing the Secretary of State to obtain a copy of the record of the trial. So this very body—the Senate—has for over a year treated Sanguily as an American citizen, and held out its hand to him as such.

This action of the Senate inspired a little life in the dilatory proceedings which had been hitherto taken. On December 7 the Assistant Secretary of State of the United States communicated this resolution to Consul Williams and instructed him—to obtain and forward to this Department as soon as practicable a certified copy of the record.

That will be found on page 69 of this record. On January 23, 1896, some six weeks later, Mr. Uhl telegraphed to our consul:

When may certified copy of record in Julio Sanguily's case be expected?

On January 24 Mr. Williams replied:

The superior court refuses to furnish a certified copy of the proceedings in the trial of Sanguily. I am translating the correspondence for transmission to you.

Upon this refusal of the Spanish court to furnish this Government with a copy of the proceedings under which it detained a citizen, Mr. Uhl telegraphed to Mr. Williams, under date of January 25, 1896, as follows:

Apply for permission to examine and copy the record in Sanguily's case. If granted, have same copied and transmit here.

On February 26, 1896, Mr. Williams reported to Mr. Uhl that he had made three ineffectual appeals to the president of the superior court for a copy of the record. He reported also his statement that the United States desired it for the purpose of comparing and satisfying itself in the exercise of its rights as one of the two contracting parties to the treaty of 1795 and the protocol of 1877, and of the refusal to accede to this very humble and modest demand.

Our consul then, foiled in his own effort to get a transcript of the paper under which this citizen was held, the United States having made requests for it in the most dignified form of international communication, and he having begged for it for the fourth time and been denied, called into consultation Señor Miguel Viondi, the advocate of Sanguily in Habana. He consulted him as his adviser, and asked him:

As you are the advocate of Mr. Julio Sanguily, please inform me the reasons upon which are founded his indictment and imprisonment; and—if I could, legally, obtain a copy of the record of his trial, and of the order of the judge for his indictment and imprisonment.

The opinion of Mr. Viondi, who very ably, eloquently, and very bravely defended Sanguily before the court before which he was tried, was given in full to our consul, and I extract from his legal opinion the following expressions. After relating somewhat of the history of the matter, he says:

From the above statement you will see that the order of indictment and of imprisonment of Mr. Julio Sanguily is founded solely, exclusively, on reasons that appear in the proceedings remitted to the civil court by the court-martial; that is, on what is prohibited by the protocol. In confirmation, I accompany a full copy of the order of indictment.

To your second question, that is, if you can, as consul-general, legally obtain copies of the record or of the order of indictment and of imprisonment, I have to say that you can legally obtain it. For although it is true that the defense of Sanguily has presented an appeal, which has been accepted, to the supreme court at Madrid, it is only against the sentence; but the record of the trial has remained deposited in the superior court of Habana, and though the latter has no authority to alter, modify, transfer, etc., the proceedings had thus far in the case, still it has authority for the issuance of copies of the full, or of parts, of the proceedings. A certified copy of the record has been transmitted to the supreme court, as I have informed you, but the original record remains in Habana. Therefore, if you, in Habana, in representation of your nation, should solicit a copy of it for your Government in order that it may see if the protocol has been faithfully observed, this could not in justice have been refused you; likewise, a copy of it should not be refused for the direct inspection of your Government.

Then he adds in answer to the pretension of the Spanish judge—

This is not a question of jurisdiction. It would be so were you to propose some modification of the record. Then the court would tell you, with reason on its part, that it has no jurisdiction, because it would be a matter for the decision of the supreme court at Madrid.

Once again our consul tried to get a copy of the record, and he communicates to our Government as follows:

The answer of Mr. Viondi, dated January 25, 1896, is herewith accompanied as inclosure 9.

Then he goes on to refer to his correspondence on the subject, and sums up the status of this matter as it stood a year and a half ago, after eleven months of diplomacy, as follows:

In brief—

He says—

This correspondence shows—

First. That the superior court of Habana refuses, alleging the lack of jurisdiction therefor, and because the case has been appealed, to furnish a copy of the record in question for the information of the Government of the United States, the other party to the treaty of the 27th of October, 1795, and of the proctocol of the 12th of January, 1877; postulating further that this consulate-general, from not being a party to the case, has no right of intervention in it.

Second. That the advocate for Mr. Sanguily, Mr. Viondi, is of the opinion that the court is authorized to furnish a copy of the record in this case in the same way as it is authorized, alike with other courts, to furnish copies and extracts of proceedings needed as evidence in other cases; also—

And I call attention to this expression of opinion of the Spanish or Cuban lawyer as concurring with the action of our State Department—also that the order of indictment and imprisonment issued by the civil judge has been based upon the proceedings of the court-martial.

It appears therefore—

And here, Mr. President, lies the meat of this whole matter, again repeated by our consul:

It appears, therefore, that the proceedings had by the superior court of the said jurisdiction in the trial and condemnation of Sanguily are but the continuation of the proceedings initiated against him by the court-martial, against which this consulate-general protested before the governor general by order of the Department of State on the 25th of last April, copy of which protest is annexed herewith as inclosure 14.

I am, etc., RAMON O. WILLIAMS,
Consul-General.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia will suspend. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business; which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 8110) to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

Mr. STEWART and others addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. I believe I am entitled to take the floor on the bankruptcy bill.

Mr. STEWART. I have the floor, I think. I was recognized when the bill was last up.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the bankruptcy bill now before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair laid before the Senate the unfinished business, which has been read by title, and which is the bankruptcy bill. The Chair was not advised, but the RECORD shows, and the Chair is now advised, that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] was upon the floor at the time the bill was up before.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Nevada, whoever has the floor, will yield, so that I can ask unanimous consent that the Senate shall now proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I yield. The Senator from Nevada has the floor, however.

Mr. STEWART. Before yielding, I should like to make some remarks about the bankruptcy bill, because there has been a speech on one side in which I think the defects of the bill did not appear. I will occupy but a minute. I think that the involuntary portion of the bill is as cruel as the genius of man can well invent. I can state the point in a minute. There are three causes of bankruptcy. One is when a note is unpaid for thirty days. Another——

Mr. HOAR. That is not in the bill. There is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STEWART. That is not in the bill, the Senator says. I have a copy of the bill here, and I can show it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada will please suspend.

Mr. STEWART. On page 5 of the bill will be found a provision that if a debtor fails to secure a release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over he shall be considered a bankrupt.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the attention of the Senator from Nevada. The Senator from Nebraska rises to a parliamentary inquiry, which he will state.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to know what has become of the joint resolution just now under consideration.

Mr. HALE. It has gone to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes to the Calendar unless the Senate should otherwise order.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has not taken the Senator from Nevada from the floor, but the Senator from Nebraska rose to a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair has answered that inquiry, and the Senator from Nevada is upon the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will answer it.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to be taken off the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wanted to state that the joint resolution of the committee was reported yesterday and is on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the joint resolution goes back to the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt of that.

Mr. LODGE. The Chair stated that it went over and went on the Calendar; that is all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not so hold.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Virginia be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. STEWART. I would have been through before now if I had been allowed to go on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Virginia be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senator from Virginia——

Mr. DANIEL. I will be very brief, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLISON. But I hope the Senator will find it convenient to postpone the completion of his remarks for a little while, in order that we may complete the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is imposible in this part of the Chamber to hear the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I have already asked unanimous consent that the bankruptcy bill may be laid aside, and that we may proceed with the Indian appropriation bill. I hope that will be agreed to, and I hope the Senator from Nevada will yield, that I may ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. STEWART. I regret very much that I can not have an opportunity to point out some of the very serious objections to the bankruptcy bill, so that the country will not have the impression that it is really a bill for the benefit of debtors when it is a most atrocious bill. It is not so designed, I grant, but its effect, it seems to me, would be most atrocious if it became a law. I will not go on with my speech now; but when the bill comes up I ask unanimous consent that I may have the floor, and I do not want anybody to take it away from me until I have made my speech.

Mr. HOAR. That is all right. The Senator is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART. When the bill comes up again, I want unanimous consent that I may expose some of its defects.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not need to obtain unanimous consent. He will be entitled to the floor when the bill comes up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Nevada as being entitled to the floor on the bill when it is again brought before the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. The next time I hope I will have a chance to show the defects in the bill. I now yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me to say that as soon as the fact was called to my attention that he had taken the floor, I yielded at once. The Senator was entirely right; and if he shall point out any of the undesigned atrocities of which he speaks the bill will be promptly amended.

Mr. STEWART. I think I can do it when I have the opportunity. I hope the Senator will call it up and give me that opportunity. I now yield to the Senator from Virginia, and hope he will have unanimous consent to conclude his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate the request of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] that the Senator from Virginia have unanimous consent to conclude his remarks at this time.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that the Indian appropriation bill will be taken up by unanimous consent, in order to relieve us of the situation with respect to the bankruptcy bill; and as the Senator from Virginia has stated that he desires to occupy only a brief time, I will with pleasure, so far as I am concerned, yield to him after the appropriation bill is taken up to conclude what he desires to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit one request at a time.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Chair will permit me, I was recognized by the Chair and made this request for unanimous consent before the Senator from Florida made his request. The Senator from Nevada took the floor and said he would yield to me in a moment. I endeavored to retain the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon that statement, the Chair will submit the request of the Senator from Iowa to the Senate. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Nevada to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to say, in response to the request, that I think appropriation bills and bankruptcy bills can wait until we can strike the chains from the limbs of an American citizen in a Spanish dungeon.

Mr. HOAR. He is not an American citizen.

Mr. MILLS. Congress will be in session, we all know, before the fiscal year will end, and we shall have ample time to attend to all these measures, even if we do not do so during the remaining days of the present session. It seems to me that the question presented by the Committee on Foreign Relations, by their unanimous report, is one that ought to command the attention of the American Senate at every moment until we shall have finally acted on it.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the request of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the motion will be voted down.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10002) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALL. Now I hope the Senator from Virginia will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Virginia desires to continue his remarks, I yield to him with pleasure, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MILLS. The rest of us can continue on the Indian appropriation bill in the same way.

Mr. HOAR. I want it understood that the bankruptcy bill will be in order after this bill is disposed of. I ask unanimous consent to that effect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. What is the request?

Mr. COCKRELL. What was the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts indicate his request fully?

Mr. HOAR. My request is that if any time intervenes when appropriation bills are out of the way, the bankrupcy bill shall retain its place.

Mr. ALLEN. I object to that, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed. The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I should say here, before passing to another point in this case, that in January, 1896, our Government did call upon the Royal Government of Spain at Madrid to furnish a copy of the proceedings under which Sanguily was held, and that this at that late day was done, nearly one year after he had been arrested.

Mr. President, if there were nothing else in this record but the plain and palpable violation of our treaty rights with Spain, it would have been enough to inspire the prompt, diligent, stern demand of this Government for the release of that prisoner. But all along the track of this history it has been evident from the course of the Spanish authorities in Cuba that they have lost no opportunity, and that they have invented opportunities, to make themselves disagreeable and offensive to our authorities and to delay the ordinary course of justice.

As soon as it became evident that Sanguily could not be successfully prosecuted in a just sense for participation in rebellion, another charge was brought against him, that of kidnaping. He was committed to court-martial under that charge. On the very next day commenced another series of protests on the part of our consul, and I beg leave to read the protest of Mr. Williams to the Captain-General of Cuba, dated April 25, 1895. On this head he says:

Notwithstanding the decree issued on the 16th of March last by his excellency the Governor-General of this island, inhibiting the military jurisdiction of the cognizance of the case of the American citizen, Mr. Julio Sanguily, and ordering its transfer to a court of the civil jurisdiction in strict observance of the agreement of the 12th of January, 1877, nevertheless, I am informed by his advocate that he has again been subjected to a court-martial by order of the military jurisdiction, this time on a charge alleged to be related to the kidnaping last year of Mr. Fernandez de Castro, and in consequence this American citizen has been again remanded into solitary confinement and deprived of all intercourse with his counselor by order of the court-martial.

Here, Mr. President, was a second offense against this citizen and a second offense against this Government in the very hour of its protest against a similar offense, and after the authorities in Cuba had pretended that they were recognizing, in some degree at least, the claim of our Government and were transferring the prisoner to the civil authorities. Our consul, in his protest, says:

This proceeding on the part of the military jurisdiction is not only an infraction of the agreement, but it is likewise in contradiction of the said decree of the 16th of March last, of his excellency the Governor-General of this island.

Showing, Mr. President, that after the righteousness and justice of our demand had been acknowledged, and in some degree carried out by the Captain-General of Cuba, the very offense was again repeated. Then he says:

I have therefore, and in compliance with the instructions of my Government, to ask your excellency to have the goodness to order that this second case against this American citizen be also transferred to the civil jurisdiction for trial, as his excellency the governor-general was pleased to order in the first case; and also by order of my Government to enter its most formal protest before the government of this island against any delay in the transferring of this second cause against Sanguily to the civil jurisdiction; as likewise to protest against all proceedings hitherto practiced in this case, or that may hereafter be practiced in this case, by the court-martial now trying this American citizen, because they are in clear contradiction of the said agreement between the two nations.

May the 4th, nine or ten days later, found Sanguily still in military bondage; and on that day the Captain-General, in his goodness, which had been so politely invoked, was pleased to repeat that he would soon send Sanguily to the civil jurisdiction, and Vice-Consul General Springer wrote to Mr. Uhl:

I understand that to-day is the tenth day that Mr. Sanguily has been "incomunicado" (in solitary confinement) by order of the military authority, not allowed the visits of his family, or even to see his advocate appointed by him for his defense.

So, Mr. President, most extraordinary exactions were made, not only upon this prisoner, but upon Aguirre, another prisoner, also. On June 25, 1895, Mr. Springer, the vice-consul, telegraphed to our Government here:

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Bail bond of $10,000 required of Aguirre, or in default thereof embargo of property for costs, is according to law, but his lawyer has not yet been permitted to examine charges, the court stating that all "sumarios" are secret according to Spanish criminal law. Bond the same in Sanguily's case, and in addition one for $20,000 for charge of kidnaping.

SPRINGER, Vice-Consul-General.

This charge of kidnaping appears to have been a mere trumped-up case. In a little while the party alleged to have been his accomplice was discharged, although for a while longer Sanguily was held; and Mr. Springer says on that subject:

I am informed by Sanguily's lawyer that another person was connected with him on the same charges or indictment of kidnaping, a certain Geraldo Portela, of this city, who was arrested subsequent to Sanguily, and confined in the Morro Castle. The case of Portela was instituted before the military authorities, while that of Sanguily was passed to the civil jurisdiction. Portela was not brought to trial, but his case was quashed and he has been released for nearly a month, and under no kind of restriction, whereas Sanguily is still imprisoned in the Cabana fort awaiting trial.

I am, etc.,
JOSEPH A. SPRINGER,
Vice-Consul-General.

Finally, Mr. President, and rather late in the day, the authorities in Cuba took the ground that our consuls did not have the right diplomatically to make the direct protest and demands upon the Cuban authorities which they were making, but it was abundantly shown by our consul in reply that under a consular treaty between Germany and Spain—

Consuls-general, consuls, vice-consuls, or consular agents shall have the right to address the authorities of their district in remonstrance against every infraction of the treaties or conventions existing between the two countries, and against whatever abuse complained of by their countrymen.

And he justly took the ground that, as we were to have the same rights as any favored nation, the United States Government was entitled to be treated in the same way.

I would call attention further, Mr. President, to the fact that Mr. Williams reports in a letter which he wrote from Brooklyn—and I would thank my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who has the record before him, and is so familiar with it, to hand that letter to me——

Mr. MORGAN. Here it is.

Mr. DANIEL. In May, 1895, Mr. Williams, our consul-general, came to the United States. He was in Brooklyn, and he wrote to our Government reciting the story of his interview with the Spanish authorities respecting Sanguily, and also respecting Aguirre. He says in the course of this letter, after reciting the arrest:

In consequence, and apprehending from the activity displayed by the Government in making arrests, in subjecting the parties arrested to court-martial for trial, in issuing proclamations suspending the action of the civil law in certain cases, and from the haste with which the military jurisdiction was proceeding in the trials of the accused, I went early the next morning, the 25th of February—to see the governor-general with the view of informing him of the American citizenship of Sanguily.

That was the day after Sanguily's arrest—

It is Sanguily, the American citizen, all the time in this correspondence, I may here observe.

On reaching the palace I learned that Aguirre had also been arrested and subjected to court-martial, and on being received by the governor-general, I informed him that both these men were naturalized citizens of the United States, and that as such they were inscribed in the register of foreigners kept by the general government of the Island of Cuba.

So here, Mr. President, let me point out, at this stage, a clear and specific reply to the suggestions that Sanguily was not an American citizen. Here is a statement of that fact by our consul to our Government, a statement acted upon afterwards by all parties. He then says:

I then remonstrated against their commitment to the court-martial for trial, and asked for their immediate transfer to the civil jurisdiction, in accordance with the terms of the said agreement.

This was instantly upon learning of Sanguily's arrest.

Mr. President, the smallest tribe in darkest Africa that has a chieftain to stand forth to represent it could never have been treated more contemptuously by a neighbor than the Government officials of the United States have been treated by the Spanish authorities in Cuba.

The governor-general—

As our consul says—

was surprised on my informing him of the American citizenship of these men, and instantly answered me in an outburst of most violent language and gesture, saying that it was a disgrace to the American flag for the Government of the United States to protect these men who, it was notoriously known, were conspirators against the Government of Spain, and exclaiming louder and in still more violent language and gesture that American citizens were openly conspiring in the United States against Spain, and that he would shoot every one of them caught with arms in hand in any attempt against the government of the island, regardless of the consequences.

This piece of brutal bluster, Mr. President, was exercised by the governor-general of Cuba to the consul of the United States, standing under our flag and representing the honor and dignity of this nation, and, sir, that was related to this Government nearly two years ago. The consul says:

Upon this utterance I calmly interjected the remark: "But, General, in carrying out such measures you will surely observe in all its parts the agreement between the two Governments?" Then recovering himself and in moderated tones he answered: "Yes; in observance of the agreement." I then said: "Well, General, that is all I have come to ask for, but these American citizens, instead of having been committed before a civil court in observance of the agreement, have been subjected for trial to a court-martial contrary to the agreement; for neither of them has been captured with arms in hand against the Government, but arrested by the municipal police while peacefully deporting themselves in the city (Habana)."

The governor-general then, the consul states—

made reference to the law governing the residence of foreigners in the Island of Cuba, giving me to understand that it was paramount to the agreement between the United States and Spain.

In other words, the governor-general of the Island of Cuba took the ground, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama, that the local laws of Spain for the government of Cuba superseded a treaty right of the United States. Says the consul:

I then replied: "But, General, the Government of the United States will never admit that a local law or regulation is superior to an international compact; that Article VI of the Constitution of the United States is very plain upon this subject; also section 2000 of the Revised Statutes of the United States requires that the same protection to person and property shall be given by the Government of the United States to naturalized citizens in foreign countries as is accorded to native-born citizens." He then said: "Yes; but let the prisoners themselves invoke their rights of American citizenship before my judge-advocate (ante mi fiscal), who will consider and decide upon their rights under the agreement." As this was a plain effort on his part to eliminate my action as the representative of the United States in the matter, I replied: "General, my Government will not accept such a proposition, nor is it contemplated in the agreement that a Spanish judge-advocate could supersede a consular or diplomatic representative of the United States on such an occasion. That therefore, just as soon as possible, I would formulate a remonstrance against the infraction of the agreement in committing Sanguily and Aguirre before a court-martial instead of before a civil court, and would present it to him for his consideration."

What was the effect of this courteous, cool, calm, and forbearing manner of the American consul to this fiery Spanish don? Says our consul:

Hereupon he again remarked, in a violent tone of voice, as though my action was voluntary and not obligatory: "Your defense of these men is a disgrace to the American flag." I then politely answered him, saying: "General, I am acting entirely within the confines of my official duty and in accordance with the instructions of the Secretary of State of the United States, and in strict conformity with the agreement of the 12th of January, 1877." I then bid him good morning and withdrew.

But he did not withdraw to his own country. I wish that the war ship, as suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], had been in the harbor of Habana, and that some admiral had been upon board of it who would have opened his guns upon the Spanish forts unless that citizen was immediately surrendered, and have taught this arrogant, insolent, brutal nation, which is the Turk of the West, the unspeakable Spaniard, who is doing the work of hell in the neighboring Island of Cuba, that when the United States of America demands the rights of one of her citizens she means to stand by the demand, and to send force to see that it is recognized and acknowledged; and if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] imagines that this country can ever secure peace by submitting to continued contumely and insult to our citizens, he has built his hopes upon a foundation of sand.

Mr. President, I might go through the rest of this lugubrious and lamentable document. I might show continued insult to our consul even after these two repeated insults, but I dislike to unfold this dismal record. I have only produced that part of it which I have read to vindicate my own action and that of the committee of which I am a member, in bringing before the Senate the resolution which has been offered. That resolution says, in effect—though I do not know that I can repeat its exact words—that the President of the United States is requested to demand of Spain the immediate and unconditional release of Julio Sanguily, and also to prefer such just claims for damages against the country which has incarcerated him unjustly as to him may seem just.

It seems that there is something going on between this country and Spain of which we are not fully advised, and the senior Senator from Maine has produced a telegram or letter which contains some assurance that poor Sanguily, at the end of two years of incarceration, after filling this record with his own piteous appeals to the nationality of his adoption to defend him, has, by his counsel, withdrawn his appeal from his last sentence of condemnation, doubtless upon some expectation or assurance if he will plead guilty of the offense with which he is charged, that pardon will be extended to him, and that, branded for life as a convict, he may steal out of the prison in which he was hopeless of any rescue by the people to whom he belonged.

Mr. President, I hope that that intelligence is not true. I hope that this Government, which has twice made demand, thrice, I may say, upon the Spanish Government to release or try this prisoner in accordance with law, which has again and again set forth its protest to governor-general and to court and to the Spanish authorities that this is unjust, will not permit its citizen, at the end of an unjust incarceration, to humiliate himself before the Spanish throne in order to get that liberty which we contend he was entitled to all along.

The humiliation of a citizen of this country is the humiliation of every man in it. Inasmuch as Spain has done this unto him, she has done it unto me and to every American citizen who is proud of his free rights under a free Constitution, and who intends everywhere and at all times to defend them.

Let me say further, Mr. President, the closing letter of our present consul in Habana sets forth a state of facts which we might well anticipate from those which have been already given to the Senate. He writes in the present year, January 6, and says:

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Habana, December 31, 1896. (Received January 6, 1897.)

SIR: Yesterday noon I visited the Cabañas fort and had a talk with Mr. Julio Sanguily, an American citizen, and formerly a general in the insurgent army. As you know, he was arrested in his house while taking a bath on the 24th of February, 1895.

Just there let me remark that so far from being armed, he was entirely without arms; and there is a fact proved in this record which goes to attest that he was not contemplating rebellion, for it was shown by a witness upon Sanguily's trial that eight months before he had pawned his sword and pistol; had parted with, to a pawnbroker, the very weapons which he would have been busy to have gotten and employed had he been upon the eve of rebellion. The consul further states:

Sanguily had proved himself a very brave and efficient officer in th Cuban war from 1868 to 1878, and had been wounded seven times. It was therefore naturally supposed that sooner or later he would have joined the insurgent side of the war now in progress in this island. He had, so far as I am informed, committed no overt act in that direction, and was taken without arms in hand.

On the 28th of November, 1895, or, say, nine months and four days after he was arrested and thrown into a cell at the Cabañas fort, he was tried and sentenced to be imprisoned for life.

Yes, he was tried by mongrel military and civil procedure more than nine months after he had been held in durance vile under such a treaty as that which we hold with Spain.

An appeal was taken to the supreme court of justice at Madrid, which decreed, upon some technical ground, that Sanguily should be retried.

Consul-General Lee relates that—

On the 21st of December, 1896, his second trial commenced, and ended by his being again sentenced to perpetual imprisonment.

From this second sentence an appeal has been taken which, whether successful or not, will greatly lengthen the time he has already passed in his cell.

Now, mark this fact. I read awhile ago the opinion given to our consul by Mr. Miguel Francisco Viondi, who defended Sanguily, and who advised our consulate in Habana. Consul-General Lee says of him:

The lawyer who defended this prisoner in his first trial now looks from the bar of a cell adjoining his in the Cabañas fort, and I am informed that the lawyer who managed his appeal before the Madrid court has suffered in consequence thereof, so that it may be difficult to procure in Madrid another person versed in the law who will consent to manage for Sanguily the appeal proceedings.

In view of all these facts—

General Lee, our consul-general, says—

In view of all these facts, and for the additional reason that Sanguily has been in a cell twenty-three months to date, is not in good health, and is suffering from old wounds, I respectfully suggest that the Department bring these facts to the notice of the Madrid Government and ask that instructions be issued that he be released from prison on the condition that he will leave this island and not return until the present war has terminated.

I should regret, Mr. President, that any condition whatsoever should be annexed to the demand for Sanguily's release; but I can well imagine that our consul-general in Cuba at so late a date as December, 1896, had despaired of any such course on the part of our Government as would have been dictated by its traditional policy, and as would seem to be demanded of a brave chieftain standing forth to defend the honor, the integrity, and the liberty of a nation, but this condition was not so humiliating as the one now suggested. It was only that he should depart in peace and return to the country of his adoption. Such a condition has been denied him. Even the proposal to leave the country and return to the United States has not been sufficient to relax the iron and relentless grasp of Spain upon a citizen which we have contended for over a year, nearly two years, she had no right to hold in the manner of arbitrary detention which she adopted in violation of our treaty with her.

Mr. President, I have little more to say on this subject. I have made a plain and explicit statement of this case, and I have gone to the prolixity of reading parts of these records so that those who read this story may understand why it is that the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate advise and ask the President to make immediate and unconditional demand upon the Spanish Governme .t for the surrender back to us of our compatriot, who for two years has lain sick and sore and wounded in a dungeon, and has never yet had the arm of America outstretched to save him from this brutal tyranny, which is the curse of Spain and the disgrace of civilization.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Virginia kindly said he would answer a question when he got through. I wish to ask him one question. When does he or the committee to which he belongs suppose that this man spent the five consecutive years of residence within the United States immediately preceding the issue of the naturalization papers which the law requires for their validity? I ask the Senator from Virginia that question, if he will answer it.

Mr. DANIEL. We have the record of the consulate in Habana; we have the decision of our State Department; we have the recognition of the governor-general of Cuba; we have the records in the case, and what everybody conceded and declared. I did not deem it necessary to investigate.

Mr. HOAR. That does not answer my question.

Mr. DANIEL. That is the answer.

Mr. HOAR. Now, it appears upon this document, repeated in a half dozen places, first that the man says he got his citizenship in 1889. I understand, however, that the Committee on Foreign Relations suggests that that is a misprint, and very possibly it is. He says in several other places—it is repeated all through—that this naturalization was taken out in the superior court of New York in August, 1878. It is repeated all through that he was engaged in the Cuban insurrection up to 1878, that he came abroad after that time, after the armistice or amnesty of that time, went to New York, and got these naturalization papers within a space of two or three months.

So it is absolutely clear that the naturalization paper was fraudulent and that the Department of State and our other officials merely took it for granted without putting the dates together; and now when they are put together it is found that the man is no more an American citizen than the Senator from Virginia is a citizen of Cuba.

Mr. STEWART. Where does the Senator get those facts?

Mr. HOAR. The committee furnished the evidence; it is all here.

Mr. HALE. The committee itself furnishes the evidence. It is in the report.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations did not think it was necessary to go behind the record of a court of record of the city of New York. I did not know it was customary to go behind the certificate of a court of record. I do not know who has power to do it. Certainly a consul of the United States has not the power to do it. It is the record of the superior court of the State of New York that that man was naturalized. It is a mere assumption and assertion that he was fraudulently naturalized. That is something which must be proved.

Mr. HALE. Would you prove it by your own——

Mr. LODGE. I am not here to prove that he was honestly naturalized. I take the record of the superior court of the city of New York, and until it is overthrown he is a naturalized citizen. Now, one word more——

Mr. HOAR. Before my colleague passes to his other word, will he yield to me for a minute?

Mr. LODGE. On the point of naturalization I should like to say now what I have to say.

Mr. HOAR. That is right.

Mr. LODGE. We issue naturalization papers to very many citizens. Perhaps some are not properly naturalized. We know that the privilege has been abused. We know that in many cases there have been fraudulent papers. But when an American citizen offers his certificate of naturalization, when it is accepted by the foreign government, when it is acknowledged by the Secretary of State, when he is duly registered in the consulate where he ought to be registered, then, Mr. President, I for one am not disposed to haggle over the question whether or not that naturalization paper was properly issued to him. We have the right to make the assumption that it was properly issued to him until the decision of the court is overthrown, and that can not be overthrown by saying that there are statements here from the consul-general which appear to conflict with the law under which the certificate of naturalization was issued.

We are bound by that, as the Secretary of State was bound. Every Spanish official admitted the citizenship of this man. Are we to say to all our naturalized citizens, "We are going to try you on the technical question whether these naturalization papers were properly issued to you before you can receive the protection of the American flag. Foreign governments may do to you anything they like, and the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives and the Department of State will not seek to protect you until they have examined your naturalization papers?" I believe, as regards all foreign countries, that our naturalization certificates should be held sacred. We should uphold them, and protect them, and defend them. If we are going to draw distinctions among our naturalized citizens, where is it to stop? Are we to say to all the naturalized Americans in this country, "We will not agree to protect you. When you take out your naturalization paper, it is waste paper if anybody chooses to question it or to intimate that some technicality is wrong?"

I do not think, Mr. President, that any government can afford to take that position. I may be entirely wrong, but it strikes me as a general matter of policy that we have to follow the old rule which Henry Clay laid down at the time of the war of 1812, that the flag at the masthead was the seaman's credential. It is perfectly true that that meant that the deck was a part of American soil, which is a different point, but the English also demanded in those days proof that the seamen were American citizens and claimed, from identity of names, that they might be of English birth. We fought that war on the ground that the flag and the ship should cover the whole case.

It seems to me we have no right to go behind the action of an American court. We are all aware that this man was born in Cuba. We are all aware that he bears a Spanish name. Those of us who have inquired into the case know that he and members of his family were educated in this country; that their relations with this country have been close. There is no denial of any of these facts. We know that he took out naturalization papers; that they were lawfully issued and duly registered in the consular court. The minister of Spain in this city has admitted his citizenship. Are we to question it?

Mr. STEWART. It was admitted in the sentence.

Mr. LODGE. It was admitted by the Spanish court. It was admitted throughout the correspondence that he was an American citizen. If Spain admits his citizenship, why should we question it?

Mr. President, this is but one case among many. I have a case within my own knowledge of two young men whose name is Glean. Glean is not a Spanish name. The father was the American consul at Sagua la Grande. He was the first American consul at that post when it was established. He was a citizen of my State, and he married a wife in my State. His boys are of American blood and parentage. By his residence there as consul he became interested in sugar plantations. He bought property and established himself. These boys carried on the business. A little while ago—last year—those two boys, who never had been anything but American citizens, without a drop of blood in their veins that was not American, had their house entered by Spanish forces and they were seized by soldiers. They were in danger of their lives. Nothing but their claim of American citizenship saved them from death. They were taken out in the heat of summer and thrown into a foul prison in Sagua la Grande. There they were kept for some months. They were tried by a military tribunal and acquitted. They were let out then on condition of reporting every three days to the Spanish commandant. They were then tried by civil court and were again acquitted. The only charge against them was that they had given shelter for one night to a man supposed to be an insurgent—a fact never proved.

Finally let out, they escaped to this country, penniless, beggared, ruined, their property destroyed absolutely. Their claims against Spain have been filed in the State Department, and they are beggars, ruined, for no reason in the world.

Those are some of the cases, Mr. President, within the knowledge of the committee. There are many others. The State Department to-day is full of reports about American citizens, unquestioned Americans, men named Scott, men named Govin, men named Glean, as these men are named, whose names alone show their citizenship. The Department is full of accounts of the wrongs, the outrages done to them. We can not get at those consular reports. They are held back from us on the ground that the consul will not be safe if he is known to have made such a report to Congress. We can not, in other words, even protect an American consul in the discharge of his duty. Those are the things which have caused the Foreign Relations Committee to feel that the time has come when we might properly act.

Let me say that those of us on the Foreign Relations Committee who have been opposed to this passive attitude in regard to the Cuban question have made no effort to press the Cameron resolution to the front. We have not sought to bring on agitating debates. We have done nothing to precipitate this question. We have allowed the resolution to lie upon the table untouched and undiscussed. We were well aware that with the Administration and Congress at odds on this matter discussion was useless. It would only lead to disturbance and could serve no good end. But when a resolution was presented to us with the absolute facts in regard to a case of this sort, we felt that we must act. We did not examine into the records of the superior court of the city of New York to see whether or not they had issued fraudulent papers to Julio Sanguily. We accepted the statement of the Spanish authorities. We accepted the statement of our own Secretary of State. We accepted the certificate of the American consul, and we took the ground that there had been a great outrage committed on an American citizen.

We thought that something ought to be done. We were not disposed to sue for his pardon. I suppose, Mr. President, that is a very wrong feeling to have, but it did not seem to the committee that it was the part of the Government of the United States to sue for the pardon of one of its citizens whom we believed innocent and who had appealed against the decision of the court. We thought we had a right to demand his surrender. That is all that this resolution is, and when we bring it in here, Senators say to us that because we wish to protect American citizens we desire to precipitate this country into war.

From 1868 to 1878 General Grant kept war ships in the harbor of Habana all the time to protect American citizens; and nobody then rose in the Senate and said that he intended war by so doing. When the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said that he thought it was the duty of the Government to send a ship of war to Habana for the protection of American citizens, the reply was immediately made: "That is what you want; you want war." It is not an act of war to send one of our ships into any port of any nation in the world with which we are at peace. Our ships of war go everywhere. It is no act of war to send them to Habana. We have the right to send our ships there to protect American citizens. We ought to have had a ship of war there all the time, ever since these troubles broke out. That is what President Grant did. That is the proper thing to do. When there are troubles going on, every nation sends its ships that they may be on hand to protect the property of its people everywhere. It is done all the time all over the world. We have sent ships and landed sailors and marines to protect American property and American citizens over and over again, and no one thought of crying out "War!" because we did so. Why, then, is it such a heinous offense to have ships of war in Cuban waters to protect American citizens?

I have no desire to argue the Cuban question. That has been gone over, and we know what the situation is in regard to it. The only point that I desire to make, the single point that the committee desire to make, is as to the protection of American citizens. We put this resolution on that ground, and that ground alone. Whatever else our duties may be, certainly one of our duties is the conservation of American interests and the protection of American citizens. That is all the committee seek. They are not seeking to pick a quarrel with Spain. They have no more desire to precipitate this country into war than any other members of the Senate. But when a case like this is referred to them, they thought, and they thought so unanimously, that it was their duty to submit the resolution and to ask upon it the action of the Senate. And when we submit this joint resolution, asking merely for the surrender of an American citizen, we are met with the reply that we want to bring on war. American citizens, in other words, are to have every infamy and injury in the world inflicted upon them, and anyone who dares to raise his voice in their behalf is told that he wants to bring on war.

Mr. President, look abroad to-day. Europe has sat by and looked on with perfect calmness while the Armenians have been slaughtered by the thousands. They have looked on with indifference while the Cretans have been struggling for freedom from the Moslems. Greece has interfered. She has attempted to rescue her fellow-men of kindred religion and race in the Island of Crete, and last Sunday the war ships of four great powers shelled those insurgents, men of their own faith, because they were trying to shake off the yoke of the Turk, and English war ships have been convoying Turkish munitions of war to the Island of Crete, if we may believe the dispatches in the newspapers. They say it is done in the interest of peace, and any man who lifts his voice, as the English people are now lifting their voices and denouncing the attitude of their Government, is told that he wants to hurl his country and Europe into war.

Ah, Mr. President, the power that is anxious to preserve the peace of Europe, the power that is so afraid that we shall vindicate and look after American citizens, is not primarily interested in peace. The power that holds those great European administrations by the throat and wishes them to keep Turkey where it is, is not a power that cares one straw for the slaughter of human beings in Armenia, but it is a power that is interested in the interest and the value of Ottoman bonds. That is what is behind this desire to keep Turkey in the control of the Greek Christians; that is what is holding the hands of Europe's Christian governments in regard to Armenia, and that is what is the trouble in this country in regard to Cuba.

The best thing that could happen to business, if business would only see it, would be to have the Cuban question settled and taken forever out of the way. But the great business interests do not wish it done. They are afraid of the immediate business result. I am not going to argue or discuss that question. We have determined, practically, at the White House and in the Capitol that the war in Cuba shall go on to its bloody, ruinous end; that that island shall be devastated and destroyed, American property and all, for it will never go back to Spain. But we have decided to let it go on. The Committee on Foreign Relations have not attempted to disturb that admirable decision. We have allowed the matter to rest. We have now simply brought in a joint resolution to try to protect an American citizen, stated to be such a citizen by the act of a court of New York, an act which can not be set aside by collateral evidence. That is all we have tried to do; that is all we ask the Senate to do. There are dozens of other cases. There are Americans to-day in those dungeons in Cuba.

To those persons in certain parts of the country who are devoted admirers of England, I commend the conduct of England when one of her citizens has been imprisoned and illtreated. Does anyone within the sound of my voice suppose that if a man bearing a naturalization certificate of the Queen of England had been treated as Julio Sanguily has been treated, England would have hesitated as to what she would do? She is anxious for an arbitration treaty with us, and is devoted to peace of course; but if Spain had laid a finger on one of her citizens, England would have had him out of his prison and had him surrendered at once if it had taken the whole fleet of England and all her army to do it. England has some very admirable qualities.

I have said far more than I meant to say, but I desired to defend the committee of which I am a member against the charge which has been made, that because we want to ask for the surrender of an American citizen we are therefore a parcel of jingoes, trying to thrust the country into war; that because we say that in times of disturbance we should do that which General Grant did, keep an adequate force in Habana to look after American interests, therefore we want to plunge the country into war. I have no desire to plunge this country into war with anybody. I do desire that an American citizen, whether he is a naturalized citizen or native born, wherever he goes, shall be protected by the power of the United States Government. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Revised Statutes of the United States declare—

> That no alien shall be admitted to become a citizen who has not for the continued term of five years next preceding his admission resided within the United States.

This man confesses, and it appears in a dozen places in the committee's report, that he came to this country after the conclusion of the rebellion of 1878, stayed here two or three months, and went back, and has not been in the United States since. He got some fraudulent papers out of a New York court, the same New York court——

Mr. LODGE. May I ask my colleague how it is proved to be a fraudulent paper?

Mr. HOAR. Because the matter of residence is distinctly shown.

Mr. LODGE. How does my colleague know that Sanguily was not here before that time?

Mr. HOAR. He must have been here five years before August 6, 1878.

Mr. LODGE. How does my colleague know he was not here?

Mr. HOAR. Because he says and the American consul says he was in the Cuban insurrection and was wounded seven times.

Mr. LODGE. Was he there the whole ten years? Is that stated?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir; it is stated.

Mr. LODGE. I wish my colleague would kindly point out that statement in the report.

Mr. HOAR. He stated himself that he was naturalized in 1889.

Mr. LODGE. Does my colleague think his statement overthrows the record of the court?

Mr. HOAR. I do. There were 60,000 fraudulent naturalization papers issued from that same New York superior court within three days in the year 1868. They floated all over a part of the country, and according to my colleague's idea every one of those fellows was entitled to plunge the United States into war if he went abroad and was badly treated. These court records are of the slightest possible importance. They are challenged at the polls; they are inquired into by election officers; and it never was pretended that they are anything but prima facie evidence. Again and again and again men have been indicted and punished for voting on them, in spite of the record.

Now, there is not any earthly question of these facts. If any other cases exist, let them be produced, and we will deal with them, but we have a case now where a man fought in the Cuban rebellion from 1868 to 1878. It appeared, in substance, during his trial that he was there at the time of the amnesty in 1878. Then he came to this country, stayed two or three months, went back with these fraudulent papers, and, as he swears expressly in his own testimony, he has been there ever since. He says he has been there nineteen years.

There is the fact, and I am not going into any other question. A question has been raised as to a pardon. I do not think a pardon would in the least affect his claim against Spain, if he has any. It is a mere mode of letting him out. If when this man is to be let out, within, as we suppose, a very few days, he is to be pardoned, he has all the rights of claim against Spain preserved, as I understand, because the pardon does not in the least take them away. If we are going to plunge this country into a war, let us have something to stand on. Let us have some facts. Let us have an American citizen, and not a man who has got a fraudulent naturalization, to do it on. That is what I claim.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask my colleague who has proposed to plunge the country into war? Does it plunge the country into war to ask for the surrender of an American citizen?

Mr. HOAR. What is proposed is to have the United States Senate demand this man's surrender. If they demand this man's surrender, and it is not done, I think the logic is to go to war to enforce the demand. I do not think the Committee on Foreign Relations are meaning simply a piece of empty bluster without having it backed up by the military and naval force of the country. If that is the intimation, I will acquit any member of that committee of any such proposition. But I say we have a right to demand of this committee to know whether this man is an American citizen or not. Of course the State Department did not question it. The facts were not brought to their attention. They found the old record, just as in the case where many pretended citizens have voted again and again. But now we have got the fact to deal with. He stated in his trial tha he was naturalized in 1889. He says in almost the same sentence that he had not been out of Cuba for seventeen years. He has to dwell within the United States to be a naturalized citizen. If, on the other hand, he was naturalized at the time he was registered in Cuba he had only been out of Cuba for a few months, and he did not get naturalization then.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss on this bill the question that has been discussed very extensively; but the Senator from Massachusetts seems to think that we ought to treat the question whether this man is a citizen or not in this body through our committee.

Mr. HOAR. We may find he is not.

Mr. TELLER. We may find that he is not, and we may find that he is. It is the first time, when a question of this kind had been determined by the authorities that were entitled to determine it, it is the first time I ever heard that we should take an appeal to the Committee on Foreign Relations or any other committee. Now, what are the facts? The Senator from Massachusetts assumes that it is a fraudulent certificate of naturalization, and then he brings in here some testimony of some kind, nobody knows whether it is correct or not, to dispute the certificate of naturalization.

Mr. HOAR. It is the testimony the Committee on Foreign Relations brings us. It is the man's own statement.

Mr. TELLER. We do not know whether it is correct or not. This man has been treated as an American citizen by the United States. He has been treated by the Spanish Government as an American citizen. In the sentence they declare he is an American citizen.

It seems to me it is not worth while for us to discuss the question whether he is an American citizen or whether he is not. He has declared before the world that he is an American citizen, and we can not escape our duty by saying this man may not be an American citizen, or by going to the extent the Senator from Massachusetts does and saying that he can not be an American citizen; that it is a fraud, because he must have been in Cuba ever since. Every intendment must be in his favor. He has a naturalization paper. He has the declaration of this Government that he is a citizen of the country. We have a statute that has been on our books for many years which declares that a naturalized citizen stands exactly equal in all respects as to the protection of his rights in foreign countries with an American citizen. Having this naturalization certificate, nobody, not even the State Department, has the right to inquire. They should first act, and inquire afterwards.

When a controversy arises between the country with whom we are contending as to whether he is a citizen, it is time enough to contest it. It has been admitted that he is a citizen. The Spanish authorities, the Captain-General, repeatedly declared that he was an American citizen. The proof is abundant that they treated him as an American citizen, and never raised the question whether he was a citizen. It is left for the Senator from Massachusetts to raise it here, while the decree declares that they have convicted and sentenced an American citizen.

Mr. President, there is not very much in this question. It is too late to raise the question, and it can only be raised when the government which claims he is infringing upon his rights says he is not a citizen. Then the question may be considered by his government whether he is a citizen or not. Here is a case where they declare he is a citizen. Here is a declaration in defiance of his citizenship that they will proceed, and proceed in a way not justified by the treaty with that country. Then we are met here with a statement that he may not be a citizen, and we will allow him to be outraged, and we will allow the Government of the United States to be insulted and debased; and then we will get out of exercising the ordinary prerogatives of a decent government by saying, "After all, I think that fellow's naturalization papers are fraudulent."

There never has been such a proposition made in American history before and I hope there never will be another. I do not know whether all the facts as we have them are true, but I do know that there is enough here to demand the interference of this Government. I do know that there is not a self-respecting government in the world that, on the state of facts presented to the Senate here to-day, would not make the demand that we are proposing to make.

I know that it may be futile for the Senate to pass such a resolution. I know the Senate passed a resolution here the other day about the Greeks which at least expressed sympathy and encouragement to them; but we are told this morning in the morning papers that a resolution of the Senate does not count, that the Secretary of State will not transmit it because it must be the action of both bodies or else he is not obliged to pay attention to it.

Mr. President, it does not make any difference, in my judgment, what may happen. You may pass this resolution and the House may approve of it, and it may go to the State Department, and the pusillanimous conduct of the Department for the last two years with reference to these things will be repeated.

I have not much expectation of anything better in the next Administration, but I thank God that at least this Administration will be going out of office and out of the way in the next ten or twelve days. I pray and hope that the Republican party, when it gets into power, may have a little of the old enterprise and spirit of the party, and that we make ourselves respected at home and abroad in as great a degree as to-day we are despised. In the whole history of this country there never has been a time when the world looked upon us with the contempt that it does to-day, and it is due to the administration of the great State Department and the executive department of the Government for the last four years.

So far as I am concerned, I agree with the Senator from Maine who sits in front of me [Mr. FRYE] when he said he would send a ship. Mr. President, I would send every ship we have got, and I would send a ship wherever there was an American citizen whose rights were being tampered with or infringed upon. I would not count dollars by the side of American manhood and American liberty and American rights. When old Paul stood before the Roman ruler and said, "I am a Roman citizen," the ruler trembled. I would make every power in the world respect American citizenship, and I would make them tremble when they did not if it took all the guns and all the ships and all the money that this country has got.

Mr. President, unless you do that you will be in trouble all the time. One single declaration that American citizenship is too sacred for the hand of the oppressor will bring peace and will save us infinite trouble and infinite difficulty. But we shall not get it, Mr. President, until we get a new Administration; and I hope we will get one then that may do these things.

JULIO SANGUILY.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, this discussion seems to be proceeding upon the Indian appropriation bill. For the purpose of testing the question whether we shall have war or peace, and whether there is really any sincerity in these resolutions, I move that the Indian appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside, and that the joint resolution with reference to Julio Sanguily be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator's motion is not in proper form. The motion will have to be to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 207, which has been under discussion.

Mr. ALLISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Committee on Appropriations if it is not possible for us to agree upon some time when the joint resolution may be taken up?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HILL. The Senate can take up the joint resolution now if it wants to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 207) demanding the release of Julio Sanguily, an American citizen imprisoned in Cuba.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the motion the Senator from Iowa calls for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HILL. I renew it.

Mr. MILLS. That is right.

Mr. HILL. Let us have a vote, and let us test the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. FAULKNER's name was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], but I am advised by him that our views upon the joint resolution are the same, and I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. I am not advised how he would vote, and therefore I withhold my vote. I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GEAR. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WHITE (after having voted in the negative). I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP] has not voted.

Mr. WHITE. I will withdraw my vote in that event.

Mr. DUBOIS. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 27; as follows:

(S. R. 207) demanding the release of Julio Sanguily, an American citizen imprisoned in Cuba.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any amendment to be proposed to the joint resolution as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LODGE, Mr. TELLER, and others. Vote! Vote!

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Government of the United States demands the immediate and unconditional release of Julio Sanguily, a citizen of the United States, from imprisonment and arrest under the charges that are pending and are being prosecuted against him in the military and civil courts of Cuba, upon alleged grounds of rebellion and kidnaping, contrary to the treaty rights of each of said Governments and in violation of the laws of nations.

And the President of the United States is requested to communicate this resolution to the Government of Spain, and to demand of that Government such compensation as he shall deem just for the imprisonment and sufferings of Julio Sanguily.

Mr. WHITE addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator from California permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. CAFFERY. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Chandler,	Lindsay,	Pugh,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from California.

Mr. WHITE resumed his speech. After having spoken in all nearly three hours,

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from California to yield to me that we may have an understanding respecting the business of the Senate for the evening.

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the Senator.

[Mr. WHITE'S speech will be published after it shall have been concluded.]

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that at 6 o'clock this evening we take a recess until 8 o'clock, and that during the night session we consider appropriation bills only. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. HILL. What is the proposition of the Senator from Iowa?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that at 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock, and that the evening session be devoted to the consideration of appropriation bills only. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH (to Mr. ALLISON). Then move to take a recess at 6 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 6 o'clock a recess be taken until 8 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that at 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask permission at this time to submit a concurrent resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President is requested to return to the Senate for further consideration the bill (H. R. 9647) to authorize the extension of the lines of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to make a brief statement respecting the resolution to this effect: It had been my purpose to antagonize the bill referred to in the resolution until certain concessions should be made by the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. I was in the Senate on the 23d of February until, I think, pretty nearly 6 o'clock, when evidently there was no intention of transacting any further business, and in my absence this matter was brought to the attention of the Senate and the conference report was formally agreed to.

Now, I hope the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] who has this matter in charge will agree to the resolution and let the measure come back from the President to be considered. I think the Senator from Michigan understood, possibly in a general way, that there would be some opposition to the conference report. There was a strong, determined purpose here——

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to say that I was not aware that there was any opposition at all to the bill referred to. The only opposition made to the bill was made by the Senator from Missouri, in regard to the issuance of stock or certificates. That was the only objection made to the bill that I am aware of. I can not see very well how the bill can be recalled now after it has passed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest to both Senators that there may be some misunderstanding about this matter, and that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLEN. I am afraid the President may approve the bill meantime, and it will become a law before action can be taken on the resolution.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think if the Senator would suggest to the President by telephonic message otherwise, he would not take any action before to-morrow, and there would be no danger of the bill becoming a law.

I will state that I had the same view as the Senator himself in regard to the bill, but I had reasons presented to me which influenced my mind, and I am satisfied will influence the mind of the Senator, not to make the contest I intended to make with him in reference to the bill; because of its meritorious character and because it involves the interests of a large number of citizens and not the interests that both the Senator and I wanted to contest.

Mr. ALLEN. I understood, and understand now, that there was quite a general purpose to antagonize the measure, and while I can not, of course, say that the Senator from Michigan knew that it was so generally understood that I supposed he did know it, I wanted to be present when this matter came up for consideration for the purpose of antagonizing and putting upon it certain amendments which it does not now contain.

I hope the Senator, in view of that fact, will permit the resolution to pass, and let the bill come back to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the committee has dealt generously with everybody on this question, and I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well, Mr. President, if that is the course to be pursued, let it be so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

Mr. HILL subsequently said: I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report on the bill (H. R. 9647) to authorize the extension of the Metropolitan Railroad Company was concurred in. I enter that motion in behalf of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and accompany it with a concurrent resolution, which I ask may go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. When was the bill passed?

Mr. HILL. Just two days ago. It is within the time.

The concurrent resolution was read, and ordered to lie over, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the President be, and is hereby, requested to return to the House for correction the bill (H. R. 9647) to authorize the extension of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia.

MRS. HANNAH LETCHER STEVENSON.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from California very kindly yields to me, and I have a personal favor to ask of the Senate.

There is a pension bill pending here the circumstances attending which are such as will appeal to every Senator. It is in behalf of the widow of General Stevenson, an old lady 78 years of age, and in very indigent circumstances. I think there will be no objection to the bill, it being in the ordinary form, giving the beneficiary a pension of $50 a month. As I have said, she is the widow of General Stevenson, who was in the Mexican war and was a brevet brigadier-general in the Regular Army. If I can secure the passage of the bill, I can obtain its passage in the House. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 3722) granting a pension to Mrs. Hannah Letcher Stevenson, widow of the late Brig. Gen. John D. Stevenson.

Mr. HILL. Not disturbing the regular order.

Mr. VEST. Of course, without disturbing the regular order. The Senator from California yields to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill he has indicated, without displacing the regular order. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Hannah Letcher Stevenson, widow of the late Brig. Gen. John D. Stevenson, at $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALIEN OWNERSHIP OF LAND IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. SHOUP. Will the Senator from California yield to me for the purpose of calling up a bill for present consideration?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9709) to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill indicated, not displacing the unfinished business. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The bill was read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LINDSAY. That is a very complex bill; it seems very important, and I do not think it ought to be passed without consideration.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Kentucky has not examined the bill, I would not ask him to vote upon it; but I beg that he will examine it.

The object to be attained is this: The present law in reference to the holding of lands in the Territories by aliens virtually shuts out all capital. For instance, in the case of a corporation, aliens can not hold over 20 per cent of the capital stock. While this bill imposes a great many restrictions, as Senators will see, to holdings by aliens, it is not as drastic as the law which it amends. So far as I am personally concerned, I would impose no restriction, for I should be delighted to see money put into the Territories, whether by aliens or not. In fact, in some cases, I should a little rather see it come from aliens than from anybody in this country. To-day there are hundreds of thousands of dollars which can be invested in the Territories, and, notwithstanding our present ideas regarding diplomacy, I do not suppose anyone will contend that the foreigner could run away with the Territory. He might possibly have the title, and if he put in his money it is hard to say which would be the better off. The people of the Territories, so far as I know, those who have interests there and who wish to see the Territories built up, are in favor of the bill. The representatives are in favor of it, and those of us who know something about it, so far as I am aware, favor the measure. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will examine the bill.

Mr. LINDSAY. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HOAR. I must object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: I objected just now to a bill which had been read through in regard to the rights of aliens in the Territories. I desire, on examination and explanation of the bill, to withdraw my objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATRICK HANLEY.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire, with the permission of the Senator from California, to call up the bill (H. R. 8706) to correct the military record of Patrick Hanley.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him, not displacing the unfinished business. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HANNAH R. QUINT.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6792) granting a pension to Hannah R. Quint.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him, not displacing the unfinished business. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pension Hannah R. Quint, widow of Brian W. Fletcher, late of Company B, Fourth Maine Infantry, at $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGENTS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1708) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1876, as amended by an act approved August 3, 1892.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him, not displacing the unfinished business. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to know how the bill proposes to change existing law?

Mr. ALDRICH. The only change in existing law is that it allows a new agent to be appointed in case of the death of the old agent.

Mr. CHILTON. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEPENDENT FREE-DELIVERY SYSTEM.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5473) concerning delivery of letters in towns, villages, and other places where no free delivery exists.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the order of business? Has the bill been reported?

Mr. CHANDLER. It has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. COCKRELL. When?

Mr. CHANDLER. It has been on the Calendar for a long time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I asked for the Calendar number, and nobody gave it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Calendar number is 1550. I beg the Senator's pardon. It allows persons to pay for their own carriers. It does not enlarge the carrier service paid for by the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 6 o'clock having arrived, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate, a recess will now be taken until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4 to the bill (H. R. 9638) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1898, and agrees to the same.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. 948) to remove the charge of desertion against Jacob M. Hamburger;

A bill (H. R. 1984) to provide for the use and occupation of reservoir sites reserved;

A bill (H. R. 4156) to amend the postal laws providing limited indemnity for loss of registered mail matter; and

A bill (H. R. 9689) for the relief of Daniel E. De Clute.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 3721) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill which will be read, not displacing the unfinished business.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOTTLING DISTILLED SPIRITS IN BOND.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that the Senate now consider a House bill entitled "An act to allow the bottling of distilled spirits in bond," which has been reported by the Senate Committee on Finance without objection. It has been so amended by the committee, I am sure, as to meet the objections of every Senator who had any; and I am certain that it will not take more than two or three minutes to act upon this important bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 8582) to allow the bottling of distilled spirits in bond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I supposed we meant to take up the Indian appropriation bill this evening.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that if this bill shall delay the Senate at all I will withdraw the request.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield to the Senator if he will allow me to get up the Indian appropriation bill first.

Mr. HALE. That is right; get the appropriation bill up and then yield.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am perfectly satisfied with that course.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the Indian appropriation bill be taken up without displacing the unfinished business. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. Which unfinished business—the Cuban resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Cuban resolution. The Chair hears no objection, and the Indian appropriation bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now the Senator has the bill up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Indian appropriation bill is before the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

BOTTLING DISTILLED SPIRITS IN BOND.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him be considered by the Senate.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 8582) to allow the bottling of distilled spirits in bond was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that the amendments of the Committee on Finance may be read as the Secretary proceeds with the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. WHITE. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that I think there is no objection. We had better get through with the matter as fast as possible.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thought we would get through more quickly in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, line 11, after the word "distiller," to insert "or owner;" and in line 18, after the word "withdrawal," to insert "which entry for bottling purposes may be made by the owner as well as the distiller;" so as to read:

That whenever any distilled spirits deposited in the warehouse of a distillery having a surveyed daily capacity of not less than 20 bushels of grain, which capacity or not less than 20 bushels thereof is commonly used by the distiller, have been duly entered for withdrawal upon payment of tax, or for export in bond, and have been gauged and the required marks, brands, and tax-paid stamps or export stamps, as the case may be, have been affixed to the package or packages containing the same, the distiller or owner of said distilled spirits, if he has declared his purpose so to do in the entry for withdrawal, which entry for bottling purposes may be made by the owner as well as the distiller, may remove such spirits to a separate portion of said warehouse which shall be set apart and used exclusively for that purpose, and there, under the supervision of a United States storekeeper, or storekeeper and gauger, in charge of such warehouse, may immediately draw off such spirits, bottle, pack, and case the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 25, after the word "proof" to insert "but produced at the same distillery by the same distiller;" and in line 27, after the word "any," to strike out "matter" and insert "substance;" so as to read:

Provided, That for convenience in such process any number of packages of spirits of the same kind, differing only in proof, but produced at the same distillery by the same distiller, may be mingled together in a cistern provided for that purpose, but nothing herein shall authorize or permit any mingling of different products, or of the same products of different distilling seasons, or the addition or the subtraction of any substance or material or the application of any method or process to alter or change in any way the original condition or character of the product except as herein authorized; nor shall there be at the same time in the bottling room of any bonded warehouse any spirits entered for withdrawal upon payment of the tax and any spirits entered for export.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 36, before the word "prescribe," to strike out "shall" and insert "may;" so as to read:

Provided also, That under such regulations and limitations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, the provisions of this act may be made to apply to the bottling and casing of fruit brandy in special bonded warehouses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 51, after the word "distiller," to insert "or owner;" so as to read:

Each of such cases shall have affixed thereto a stamp denoting the number of gallons therein contained, such stamp to be affixed to the case before its removal from the warehouse, and such stamps shall have a cash value of 10 cents each, and shall be charged at that rate to the collectors to whom issued, and shall be paid for at that rate by the distiller or owner using the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 60, after the word "bottle," to insert:

It being understood that the spring season shall include the months from January to July, and the fall season the months from July to January.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 17, before the word "gauger," to insert the words "storekeeper or storekeeper and;" in line 19, after the word "therein," to strike out "and reduce, by the addition of pure water only, such spirits as are withdrawn for bottling purposes, below the original proof, but to not less than 80 per cent proof," and to insert "and may whenever necessary reduce such spirits as are withdrawn for bottling purposes by the addition of pure water only to 100 per cent proof for spirits for domestic use, or to not less than 80 per cent proof for spirits for export purposes;" so as to read:

The distiller may, in the presence of the United States storekeeper or storekeeper and gauger, remove by straining through cloth, felt, or other like material any charcoal, sediment, or other like substance found therein, and may whenever necessary reduce such spirits as are withdrawn for bottling purposes by the addition of pure water only to 100 per cent proof for spirits for domestic use, or to not less than 80 per cent proof for spirits for export purposes, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and no spirits shall be withdrawn for bottling under this act until after the period shall have expired within which a distiller may request a regauge of distilled spirits as provided in section 50 of the act of August 28, 1894.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. NELSON. I regret to say that I am compelled to oppose the bill. I have received remonstrances from many of my constituents who insist that it is a bill tending to give the distillers a monopoly of the bottling business, to the detriment and damage of the other wholesale dealers in liquors.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will say that that objection might have obtained as the bill came from the House to the Senate Committee on Finance. The word "owner" has been inserted wherever the word "distiller" appears, and no privileges are given to the distiller that are not given in equal measure to the owner. I am sure that the objection of the Senator from Minnesota is removed as the Finance Committee of the Senate has amended the bill. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who reported the bill, was the author of all the amendments, which obviate every objection the Senator suggests.

Mr. NELSON. I would be glad to make an inquiry of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator will allow me, I will say one word about the measure. I have been interested in this measure because the people of my State are largely interested in the production of wines, and consequently of grape brandy. I believe the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky is entirely correct. I believe there is nothing in the bill which is not in the interest not only of the producer of the article, but also of those who have invested their money in it.

Mr. NELSON. I dislike to interrupt the proceedings or to object to any Senator's bill, but I desire to state that I have received a great many remonstrances from the wholesale dealers in St. Paul and Minneapolis, in my State, against the bill as it passed the House. If those objections have been removed, I shall not object to the bill. If they have not, I must object to it.

Mr. WHITE. Permit me to say——

Mr. NELSON. I should like to hear from the Senator from Rhode Island after the Senator from California has spoken.

Mr. WHITE. The actual producers of the article referred to favor the bill. Those who deal in the adulterated article oppose it. I trust the Senator from Minnesota, if the matter is postponed, will investigate it, at the same time remembering that the actual producer, the person whose money is involved in the original product, is in favor of the bill. Unless the Senator from Minnesota has some knowledge actually pertaining to the matter now before us and which will justify the postponement of this measure, I hope he will submit it to a vote.

Mr. NELSON. I want to ask the Senator a question. Does the bill give the same bottling privileges to the wholesale dealers that it gives to the manufacturers and producers?

Mr. WHITE. It does; and the Senator from Rhode Island will be able to assure the Senator from Minnesota that that is the case.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to hear from the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill as it came from the House, I will state in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota, was extremely objectionable, not only to the large number of wholesale dealers throughout the country, but to all persons who are anxious that the revenue should be preserved; but I think that every one of the objections urged by the wholesale dealers, and so far as I know by anyone else, has been removed by the amendments suggested by the committee. I think in its present shape the bill will be entirely satisfactory to the Senator from Minnesota and his constituents.

Mr. NELSON. Upon these assurances, I will withdraw all opposition to the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PEFFER subsequently said: I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed this evening the bill (H. R. 8582) to allow the bottling of distilled spirits in bond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

Mr. VEST. I move to lay the motion upon the table. It is a motion to reconsider, as I understand.

Mr. HALE. The motion was only entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table will be entered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that both motions be entered together.

Mr. PEFFER. I do not wish any further action, but simply to enter the motion to reconsider at this time.

Mr. ALDRICH. The motion of the Senator from Missouri can also be entered at the same time.

Mr. PEFFER. In the meantime, I will consider what has been done.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the words "or owner" were inserted in the bill; so that owners may bottle spirits, to which some objection was made.

Mr. PEFFER. I was unavoidably absent when the vote was taken on the bill, and being called off suddenly I was not aware of it, so that I do not know what was done; but if the question can lie over until to-morrow, I will find time to examine it, and probably everything will be found right by that time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is the motion, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas submitted a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (H. R. 8582) to allow the bottling of distilled spirits in bond.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that.

Mr. PEFFER. I think, if the opportunity be afforded me for an examination, that perhaps within the next half hour I can be satisfied upon the point which I am not quite satisfied upon now; and the matter can go over until then.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well.

Mr. PEFFER. At any rate, I shall not delay it long.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Senator make a motion to reconsider, or enter a motion to reconsider?

Mr. PEFFER. I enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well.

Mr. PEFFER subsequently said: Mr. President, having had some conversation with Senators who favored the passage of the bill to which I entered a motion to reconsider a while ago, I ask leave now to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed House bill 8582. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn.

IMPURE AND UNWHOLESOME TEA.

Mr. WHITE. I ask for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 3725, a bill to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea, a bill approved by the Treasury Department and unanimously by the committee to whom it was referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him be now considered by the Senate, with the understanding that the unfinished business and the Indian appropriation bill shall retain their places.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I feel that we should go on with the appropriation bill.

Mr. WHITE. I will say to the Senator that if there is any discussion with reference to this matter, I will withdraw the request.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I give notice that I shall object to any further unanimous consent until we take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator will except the bill that I was about to call up when I yielded to the Senator from California.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can not do it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know the Senator can do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill called up by the Senator from California will be read as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLEN. I supposed it was to be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Nebraska so desires, the Chair will have the bill read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 3725) to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire that we shall now proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will allow me to have a bill passed. It has been read, it has been amended to suit everyone who has examined it, and it will take but a moment. It is a bill to enable the Government to take all the property at Great Falls——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not press that matter now. Let us go on with the Indian appropriation bill for a while and see what we can do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota declines to yield further.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10002) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Interior," in line 8, page 72, insert the words "unless such award has been paid to and accepted by the claimant."

Mr. BROWN. This being an important amendment and partly discussed, I should like to have a quorum of the Senate present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah having suggested the absence of a quorum, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Chandler,	Kenney,	Pettigrew,
Allen,	Chilton,	Lindsay,	Pugh,
Allison,	Cockrell,	McMillan,	Quay,
Bacon,	Daniel,	Mantle,	Shoup,
Baker,	Davis,	Martin,	Smith,
Bate,	Faulkner,	Mitchell, Wis.	Teller,
Berry,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Thurston,
Blackburn,	Gorman,	Murphy,	Vest,
Brown,	Hale,	Nelson,	Vilas,
Burrows,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Walthall,
Caffery,	Hill,	Pasco,	Wetmore.
Call,	Hoar,	Peffer,	White,
Cannon,	Jones, Ark.	Perkins,	Wilson.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. VILAS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROWN. I ask to have the amendment read in connection with the text which it proposes to amend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Interior," in line 8, page 72, insert the words "unless such award has been paid to and accepted by the claimant;" so that when amended the sentence will read, after the word "issue," in line 5:

> And no right of either party shall be impaired by reason of any previous award or ruling made by the Secretary of the Interior unless such award has been paid to and accepted by the claimant.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I see that this seems to be a controverted question and liable to lead to considerable discussion. I therefore suggest that we try to dispose of those amendments over which there will not be so much controversy, perhaps, and let this lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the pending amendment of the committee and the amendment to it may lie over until to-morrow morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, after line 17, the Committee on Appropriations report to insert:

For completion of the digest, now being prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, of the decisions of the courts and the Interior Department, and of the opinions of the Attorney-General, relating to Indian Affairs, under authority of the Indian appropriation act approved June 10, 1896, $2,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may authorize said work to be performed by an employee of the Indian Office out of office hours and pay a proper compensation to such clerk therefor. And the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to settle the accounts of Kenneth S. Murchison, allowing him credit for such sums as he has disbursed or may hereafter disburse to himself or to Millard F. Holland, under authority of the Secretary of the Interior, for services heretofore, or that may be hereafter, rendered by them in connection with the preparation of said digest.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to amend the amendment by adding after the word "disbursed," in line 5, on page 69, the words "under the appropriation heretofore made." It is an unexpended balance. Then, after the word "disburse," in the same line——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota will suspend until the amendment to the amendment is read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "disbursed," in line 5, page 69, insert the words "under the appropriation heretofore made."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I prefer that that amendment should not be acted upon until there is some explanation made about it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to perfect the amendment; that is all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggested that this amendment of the committee be passed over yesterday, because it seems to me, as it is at this time, it is exceedingly indefinite. If it is the intention to make the appropriation in line 2 a part of the $2,000 hereinbefore appropriated, all this could be reached by inserting, after the word "and" and before the words "accounting officers," in line 2, page 69, the words "out of the said sum of $2,000," so as to limit the appropriation to the $2,000. If it is not limited to the $2,000 there ought to be some words of limitation applied to it, because there is absolutely no limit to it. If it is a separate appropriation——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am undertaking to do that by the amendment which I have just offered and by another amendment which I shall offer.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let them both be read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let them both be read for information, as I think, so far from accomplishing that, they open the door wider than it was before.

Mr. PETTIGREW. As I understand it, the appropriation heretofore made has not all been expended for the reason that the accounts were not passed by the Treasury Department, and the purpose is not to appropriate a sum of money greater than $2,000 in addition, but to allow them to use that money which is already appropriated. I think this amendment to the amendment, which was suggested by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, covers the ground.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator will allow the amendments to be read for information, and not have them adopted before we understand them, perhaps I shall have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota will state the two amendments, and then both will be read by the Secretary. The Senator will state the last amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Secretary has the first one I offered, and the second is, after the second word "disburse," in line 5, to insert the words "nnder this appropriation for this purpose."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as proposed to be amended will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "disbursed," in line 5, insert the words "under the appropriation heretofore made;" and after the word "disburse," in the same line, insert the words "under this appropriation for this purpose;" so that if amended that clause of the amendment would read as follows:

And the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to settle the accounts of Kenneth S. Murchison, allowing him credit for such sums as he has disbursed under the appropriation heretofore made, or may hereafter disburse under this appropriation for this purpose, to himself or to Millard F. Holland, under authority of the Secretary of the Interior, for services heretofore, or that may be hereafter, rendered by them in connection with the preparation of said digest.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As I understand the amendment, the first part, on page 68, makes an appropriation of $2,000 to accomplish this work. The question in my mind was whether the intention of the committee was to have a separate appropriation by the latter part of the amendment, beginning at the word "and," in line 2, and if they did, there ought to be a limitation to it. If they intend it to be a part of the $2,000 provided for in the first part of the amendment, it ought to be so expressed. As I understand the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota, it will limit the latter part of the appropriation to an appropriation heretofore made, which was $3,000, if I am not mistaken, in the last act.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Three thousand dollars.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. How much of that $3,000 has been expended?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My understanding was that it had all been expended, but that there was a claim that there was a considerable amount of work done that was not covered by that appropriation, and that this $2,000 was intended to cover that. However, I shall not insist on any further amendment, but I hope that when this paragraph is taken up in the conference committee, that point will be examined, and that it will be amended so as to express clearly the meaning of the committee.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say to the Senator that if the amendments which I have suggested do not cover the ground absolutely, we will try and fix it up so that they shall.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to draw the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the fact that the same words ought to be used in line 25 on page 68, and in the second line on page 69. At one place it says "employee" and in the other it is "clerk." The same word ought to be used in both places.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. Let it read "a clerk" instead of "an employee."

Mr. VILAS. I move to strike out in line 25 the words "an employee" and insert the words "a clerk."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment to the amendment will be made, if there be no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The next amendment passed over is on page 48.

The SECRETARY. On page 48, after line 17, the Committee on Appropriations report to insert:

For the purchase of the east half of section 16, township 107, range 48, Moody County, in the State of South Dakota, to be used as an industrial farm for said Flandreau School, at a price not to exceed $25 per acre, $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. When this amendment was before the Senate a few days ago, I took occasion to state that in my opinion this is not an opportune time for Congress to go into the business of purchasing prairie farm lands at $25 or $50 an acre. Now, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to discuss the amendment any further this evening, but I do desire to record my vote against it, and I trust the Senate will grant me the courtesy of giving me the yeas and nays on the question as to whether we ought to make this investment. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will consent to striking the amendment out of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That suits me better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment reported by the committee is withdrawn.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be disagreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; let the amendment be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be regarded as disagreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is an amendment on page 52, which was passed over, which I ask to have considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, after line 10, the Committee on Appropriations reported to insert:

For the purchase of not less than 100 acres of good farming land in the immediate vicinity of the Indian training school at Pierre, S. Dak., to be used as an industrial farm for said school, and to be, in his judgment, suited for such purpose, $5,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he is willing that that shall likewise go out of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senator insists upon calling for the yeas and nays, I probably shall consent to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall probably make a point of order against it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to say that this amendment is recommended by the Department, as well as was the other. In this case the Department made suggestions with regard to a modification of the amendment, which the committee adopted; so that it is exactly as recommended and approved by the Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator in reply that this amendment is general legislation on an appropriation bill. If there is need of this appropriation, the Senator can bring in a bill and have it acted upon in the usual way, when we can examine it and discuss it. I make the point of order that the amendment is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am not going to consent to the striking out of this amendment, but I am willing that it shall be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. That is right.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And then I shall offer the other amendment which I have just withdrawn. That can go over until to-morrow also.

I presume there will be a controversy over the amendment with regard to the Five Civilized Tribes——

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir; there will be.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. BATE. I said that there would be a controversy over the amendment in relation to the Five Civilized Tribes, and I suggest that that go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Upon the amendment with regard to the Five Civilized Tribes there are Senators who desire to speak, and so it seems to me we might as well pursue the discussion to-night, with the understanding that there shall be no vote taken upon it.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to propose an amendment on page 50, line 11, after the word "dollars," by inserting the following:

For a dormitory for boys, $3,500, to be immediately available.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That amendment is recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Now I ask to have the total changed, in lines 11 and 12, to "$34,250" instead of "$30,750."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. On page 37 I wish to offer an amendment, in lines 1 and 2, by striking out the words "to be paid out of the interest of the trust fund of said Indians."

Mr. COCKRELL. Why is that amendment offered?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I would say that these words were inserted by the House of Representatives in the clause making appropriations "for pay of employees at the several Ute agencies." It is an entirely new item, and I have a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which I shall have read if it is desired.

Mr. TELLER. The amendment is offered simply because there is no interest there out of which the payment can be made, and there will be no funds to pay the employees if the words the Senator moves to strike out are left in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to make a suggestion or two as to the amendment on page 57, relating to the Five Civilized Tribes. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the first proposition of the amendment, which reads:

That said Commission—

Commonly known as the Dawes Commission—shall set apart the lands upon which any town is now located in the Indian Territory, together with a reasonable amount of land to provide for the future growth of said town; also all lands occupied by any church, cemetery, school, charitable or penal institution, or public building of any sort outside of the limits of any town; also all mineral lands, including coal-oil and natural-gas lands, now leased, occupied, and improved for mining purposes; etc.

I find a good deal of objection among the Indians to the incorporation of this amendment. Such of them as have spoken to me personally, or by their attorneys or agents, object to the entire amendment. Still, if it is insisted upon by the Senate, they desire to suggest one or two amendments to the amendment.

I wish to ask, in the first place, the Senator who has charge of this bill why it is necessary to change the present plan of adjusting these difficulties in the Indian Territory? Why not let the Dawes Commission go on with their work? An appropriation was made last year for the Commission and another one is made in this bill, or in another bill, for continuing the work of the Commission. Why now interfere with the progress of their labor by a specific act of Congress? I think it would be more satisfactory to the Indians generally, now that the Dawes Commission has undertaken its labors, to let them go on and treat with the Commission. I ask the question of the Senator who has charge of the bill, what advantage is there in making this change?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say briefly to the Senator that there are 400,000 people in the Territory and that we have two sets of courts—courts to try offenses and cases between Indians and Indians, and courts to try offenses between white people and white people and white people and the Indians; that these tribal courts are absolutely corrupt in every particular; that judges and juries can be bought, and are bought, openly and aboveboard. Witnesses who are troublesome are shot down. There is no protection for life or property. Last year there were over 300 murders, and in one judicial district in the month of December there were 31 murders. It is for the purpose of blotting out this stain upon our civilization that we are trying to undo this condition of affairs in that country, and it is the purpose of the committee to wipe out the jurisdiction of those tribal courts and confer jurisdiction upon the United States courts of the business of that Territory.

Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator will allow me, I am not speaking to the same amendment which the Senator is. I am not referring to the courts at all. I am speaking to the first part of the amendment which begins in line 3, on page 57.

Mr. PETTIGREW. In regard to the allotments?

Mr. PEFFER. Yes, in regard to the allotments.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That amendment it was agreed should go over until to-morrow. It was a controverted question. However, if the Senator desires to discuss it to-night, that would probably be just as well as to have it go over. I suggest, if any Senator wants to speak upon it, that I shall have no objection.

Mr. PEFFER. I shall only occupy a very little time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not understand the Senator's question. If he is talking of the question of allotting the use of these lands, I will say that the amendment simply provides for the allotment of the use of agricultural lands, not mineral lands or town sites.

Mr. VILAS. I ask if the amendment in regard to the Five Civilized Tribes has been taken up for consideration?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all. The Senator from Kansas asked me a question in regard to it, and I was simply answering the question.

Mr. PEFFER. I do not think still that the Senator understands my question. I do not wish to discuss it at any length, but I want to be informed regarding it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PEFFER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to suggest to the Senator from Kansas that I learn that there is a probability that those favoring this amendment and those who are opposed to it are likely to make considerable modifications in reference to it and that an arrangement may be made whereby certain portions of this amendment will be omitted. If that be true, I think the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota that this amendment go over is a wise one. It seems to me a useless thing here to debate the details of an amendment which is likely to be modified when the matter comes up for consideration to-morrow. So I suggest to the Senator from Kansas, unless this amendment is to be considered and disposed of to-night, it is wise to allow the whole matter to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. PEFFER. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that I was not aware of any arrangement of the kind of which he speaks.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no arrangement; but there may be one.

Mr. PEFFER. It is not my purpose, I will state to the Senator, to discuss the amendment at length. I merely wanted to be informed as to one or two matters, and perhaps the Senator from South Dakota can give me the information, if he is permitted to, and I be not interrupted,

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not interrupt the Senator from Kansas or the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PEFFER. I first want to know what advantage is expected to be derived by this amendment, in taking away from the Dawes Commission the right and the power which they now have to treat with the Indians in respect to all these matters?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state to the Senator that we do not take away the right or the power to treat, but, on the contrary, we provide that if at any time they make a treaty which is ratified by a tribe, this act shall no longer apply to that tribe.

Mr. PEFFER. One other question. Beginning at the semicolon in line 9, on page 58, the amendment reads:

Also all mineral lands, including coal-oil and natural-gas lands, now leased, occupied, and improved for mining purposes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. We do nothing with that. It is left as it is. We do not interfere with it in any way.

Mr. PEFFER. Would the Senator be willing to accept two amendments? To insert the word "and," after the word "leased," in line 10; and in the same line, after the word "occupied," to strike out the word "and" and insert "or;" so as to read:

Now leased and occupied or improved.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know that there is any particular objection to that.

Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator will be willing to accept that amendment, I have nothing further to say at this time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, on page 57, after the word "leased," it is proposed to insert the word "and;" and after the word "occupied," in the same line, it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and insert "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I think there ought to be an amendment to this amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendment has gone over until to-morrow.

Mr. PLATT. Has it gone over?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes. I simply answered a question of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps the Senator from South Dakota would accept an amendment striking out the words, in line 16 and 17, "now living with said tribes?"

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall not object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. VILAS. If this is a convenient time for the Senator from South Dakota, I should like to offer an amendment which has been agreed to by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] will first be stated. Then the Chair will recognize the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

The SECRETARY. In lines 16 and 17, on page 57, after the word "freedmen," it is proposed to strike out the words "now living with said tribes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. Let my amendment be now stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

Mr. PLATT. I will let my amendment go over until to-morrow. I understand that the amendment is not quite satisfactory, and I propose that the matter go over.

Mr. WALTHALL. We can make it so in a minute.

Mr. PLATT. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WALTHALL. I prefer to have it considered now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be regarded as reconsidered if there be no objection.

Mr. WALTHALL. This matter can be adjusted in a minute. I move to strike out the words "now living with said tribes," beginning in line 16, and to insert "including the Mississippi Choctaws." There is no objection to that, I think.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will be stated as modified by the Senator from Mississippi.

The SECRETARY. In line 16, after the word "freedmen," it is proposed to strike out the words "now living with said tribes" and insert "including the Mississippi Choctaws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 2, on page 77, it is proposed to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to adjust the account of J. Montgomery Smith, late a member of the Chippewa Indian Commission, for his services and compensation, for proper expenses in completing his work, and closing his accounts in connection with said commission, from the 11th day of June, 1896, when said commission was abolished, to the 13th day of July following, as if he had remained a member of said commission to the last-named date, and to pay the amount due him thereon, $359, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to the amendment. The amount is justly due. I have thoroughly examined it, and so have the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 8, on page 53, it is proposed to insert:

For the construction of main building, $700, to be immediately available; for salary of superintendent of construction, $800, to be immediately available.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This school at Rapid City was provided for last year and $25,000 appropriated. The Department spent $3,000 for the site and advertised for bids for the building. The lowest bid was $22,700. The amount of money on hand is but $22,000. The Department therefore ask that this additional appropriation be made, so that they will not have to get up new plans and readvertise, and thus lose the summer. They say if this can be done they can complete the building so as to use it next September. The $800 for the superintendent of construction is necessary for the same reason, there being no money in the former appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The sum total should be corrected to read: "$31,400."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made by the Clerk, as usual.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now offer another amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in on page 35, at the end of line 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, after line 3, it is proposed to insert:

For pay of employees at the Sisseton and Wahpeton agencies, S. Dak., $3,960.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The necessity for this arises from the fact that there is no money whatever provided under existing law for the payment of any employees at this agency; during the last year there has been none, and they have got along as best they could. It therefore becomes absolutely necessary that this appropriation should be made. I made inquiry of the Department yesterday, and find that there is no provision whatever under existing laws for the payment of any employees but the agent, and that this appropriation is absolutely necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, at the end of line 14, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That $5,000 of said sum shall be expended to survey and resurvey, if necessary, the lands in the Rosebud Indian Reservation, in South Dakota, south of and near White River, where the Lower Brule Indians now reside, to be immediately available.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This does not increase the appropriation, but simply provides that of the sum appropriated by the other House $5,000 shall be used to survey the land, or resurvey the land, where the Lower Brule Indians located late last fall. Some of these Indians were here before the Committee on Indian Affairs and were very anxious to take their allotments, a good many of them having their houses already built, and this survey will enable them to do so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, at the end of line 20, it is proposed to insert:

That a separate agency is hereby created to cover and have jurisdiction over all that portion of the White Mountain or San Carlos Reservation lying north of Salt or Black River, to be known as Fort Apache Reservation, with headquarters at Fort Apache, Ariz.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The last amendment proposes to divide the San Carlos Indian Reservation into two reservations. There are two reservations to-day. In other words, one-half of those Indians live on one side of Salt River and the other half on the other side.

Mr. COCKRELL. How far apart?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Eighty-seven miles apart, over a mountain road. They have a subagent at the other agency. There are 1,700 Indians at one and nearly 3,000 Indians at the other. The Department recommended the change, and presented a document in support of their recommendation. The amendment is suggested by the Department, and is in the terms they recommend.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will have that document inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask consent that the document be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The document referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 10, 1897.

SIR: There is transmitted herewith a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated 2d instant, recommending that a part of the San Carlos Indian Reservation, in Arizona, be separated and created an independent reservation, to be known as the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, and put in charge of a separate agent. There is also submitted a map of the present reservation, showing clearly the proposed division. Voluminous reports on the matter are on file in this Department, and will be sent to the appropriate committee if desired.

The Commissioner's recommendation has my approval, and I have therefore to request that the item proposed by him be inserted in the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10002) now under consideration in the Senate, and that said bill be consistently amended as suggested in the accompanying letter.

Very respectfully,

D. R. FRANCIS, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 2, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the report of Lieut. W. C. Rivers, First Cavalry, in charge of the White Mountain Apache Indians, referred to this office by the Department for report January 24, 1896, and to inclose copy of report thereon from Capt. A. L. Myer, Eleventh Infantry, acting agent at San Carlos Agency, dated December 20, 1896, together with tracing showing boundary of proposed separate reservation. In his report Captain Myer coincides with Lieutenant Rivers as to the advisability of setting aside the Fort Apache Reservation as a separate Indian agency, as fully set forth in his said report. The reasons given by Captain Myer are briefly as follows: No one agent, no matter how energetic, can supervise the territory now embraced in the San Carlos Agency, and give the required attention to the Indians located near the agency and also to the Indians, located north of the Black or Salt River, as the distance between the agency proper and Fort Apache is 80 miles over a very rough mountain road, and the mail facilities are such that it requires two weeks to receive an answer to a letter from the agency proper to the subagency at Fort Apache. Besides this, the agent located at San Carlos can not possibly visit Fort Apache more than once in each quarter, and as he is responsible for the property there, he can not have personal supervision of the same, and is compelled to depend on others.

The inaccessibility of the present subagency at Fort Apache from the agency at San Carlos may be better understood when it is known that to travel from one place to the other over the 80 miles distance and crossing the range of mountains dividing the two places it requires six days to make the trip with six mules hitched to an ordinary army escort wagon, and it would be impossible for a strong team to haul an ordinary spring wagon over the divide. There is no mail route between the two places, and the mail in getting from the agency to the subagency, or vice versa, travels around over a distance by wagon and rail of over 500 miles.

As will be seen from Captain Myer's report, the total amount paid employees, aside from employees of the Fort Apache school now on the White Mountain Apache Reservation, is $9,960. If a new agency were established additional employees would be required, as follows: One clerk, $1,000; 1 miller, $840; 6 police privates, $740, making a total increase over present expenditures of $2,560. The salary of the agent at, say, $1,500, would not be used in case an Army officer were placed in charge of the agency.

In view of the statements contained in Lieutenant Rivers's report and the report of Captain Myer thereon, and having considered the situation at that point and the benefits to be derived by the Indians of the reservation, and the fact that the business between this office and that reservation would be greatly facilitated were it a separate agency, I have the honor to respectfully recommend that all that part of the present White Mountain or San Carlos Reservation (as declared and modified by Executive orders dated November 9, 1871; December 14, 1872; August 5, 1873; July 21, 1874; April 27, 1876; January 26 and March 31, 1877) lying and being north of the Salt or Black River, be set aside by Executive order and declared to be a separate and independent reservation, to be known as the Fort Apache Reservation, and placed under a separate United States Indian agent. This would give a population of 3,090 Indians below the Salt or Black River on the San Carlos Reservation, and 1,782 above said river on the Fort Apache Reservation, according to the census taken by Captain Myer in July, 1896.

If this recommendation meets with your approval, I have the honor to respectfully recommend that the following item be inserted in the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10002) now under consideration:

"That a separate agency is hereby created to cover and have jurisdiction over all that portion of the White Mountain or San Carlos Reservation (as declared and modified by Executive orders dated November 9, 1871; December 14, 1872; August 5, 1873; July 21, 1874; April 27, 1876; January 26 and March 31, 1877) lying and being north of the Salt or Black River, to be known as the Fort Apache Reservation, with headquarters at Fort Apache, Ariz."

Also that the bill be amended as follows:

Page 1, "for pay of fifty-six agents of Indian affairs," etc., to read "for pay of fifty-seven agents of Indian affairs," etc.

Page 6, line 20, after the words "any or," insert "$86,500" in lieu of "$85,000."

Very respectfully,

THOS. P. SMITH,
Acting Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That necessitates another amendment. On page 3, at the end of line 2, I propose to insert:

At the Fort Apache Agency, Ariz., $1,500.

That is a provision for the payment of an agent. The subagent, who gets $1,200 now, is disposed of by this amendment, so that the increase is only $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. On page 6, line 20, the total appropriation for Indian agents will have to be increased to correspond with the item just agreed to, so that it will read "$86,500," instead of "$85,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The change will be made by the Secretary.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, after the word "dollars," in line 5, it is proposed to insert:

Of which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, there shall be expended by the Secretary of the Interior in the erection of two day schoolhouses for the Lower Brulé Indians who reside on the Rosebud Agency south of White River.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This amendment does not carry an appropriation. Last fall about 500 Indians went south of White River and have taken up their lands there and are building houses. This provides for two schoolhouses for them, to be located by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. On page 33, after line 12, I move to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, line 12, after the name "South Dakota," it is proposed to insert:

And $2,200 may be expended by the Secretary of the Interior to construct a blacksmith shop, carpenter shop, and dwelling house at a point south of White River, on the Rosebud Agency, where the new issue house is to be located, to be immediately available.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This amendment does not increase the appropriation. It simply provides that these buildings shall be erected at the place to which the Indians have gone. I had a conversation with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the subject, and he earnestly recommended the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have an amendment which I was requested to offer by the chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs. It relates to the New York Indians.

Mr. HALE. Has it been submitted to the committee?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It has not been submitted to the committee. Neither has it been submitted to the Department.

Mr. HALE. Then I shall object to it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish the Senator would not do that until he has heard what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 8, on page 30, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to make allotment among the Indians entitled thereto of all the lands embraced in the Allegany and Cattaraugus Indian reservations in the State of New York: Provided, That after such allotment shall have been made, the power of alienation in said lands shall be suspended for a period of twenty years.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire that the amendment shall be printed in the RECORD, and go over until to-morrow.

Mr. QUAY. The amendment has not been before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALDRICH. It might as well be objected to now.

Mr. QUAY. The committee has not considered it.

Mr. ALLISON. It ought not to be done anyway. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa make the point of order on the amendment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. QUAY. Let it go over.

Mr. ALLISON (to Mr. PETTIGREW). Offer it to-morrow.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer the amendment to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the amendment may be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment will go over and be printed.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if the committee is now through with its amendments?

Mr. GORMAN. A great many amendments have gone over until to-morrow.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The committee amendments are disposed of, except those which have gone over until to-morrow.

Mr. MANTLE. I desire to offer an amendment. On page 63, after the word "dollars," in line 25, I move to insert the words "to be immediately available."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say that the amendment simply makes available money to survey a boundary line. If it be not available until the 1st of July, the work can not be completed this year. Making it immediately available, the work can be completed this year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANTLE. I desire to offer another amendment. It is an amendment proposed by the Indian Affairs Committee.

Mr. ALLISON. On what page and line is the amendment to be inserted?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is entirely new matter.

Mr. MANTLE. This is a new amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Where is it to be inserted?

Mr. MANTLE. I wish it to become a part of the bill. It is a distinct and separate proposition, not connected with any item now in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be reported, and then we will see where it should come in.

Mr. MANTLE. It may be inserted at the end of the bill.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following:

That there be paid to the Naalem band of the Tillamook tribe of Indians, of Oregon, the sum of $10,500, to be apportioned among those now living and the heirs of those who may be dead, by the Secretary of the Interior, as their respective rights may appear; and that for this purpose there be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,500: Provided, That said Indians shall accept said sum in full of all demands or claims against the United States for the lands described in said agreement.

Mr. ALLISON. I reserve the right to make a point of order on the amendment until I understand what it is.

Mr. MANTLE. Then I desire that the amendment shall go over. I have still another amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over and be printed.

Mr. MANTLE. I understand that is the request of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. It is.

Mr. MANTLE. I have another amendment which I desire to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 4 on page 85 it is proposed to add:

That section 8 of an act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, be amended by striking out from the last paragraph of said section the following proviso, to wit:

"Provided, however, That any person who, in good faith, prior to the passage of this act, had discovered and opened or located a mine of coal or other mineral shall have a preference right of purchase for ninety days from and after the official filing in the local land office of the approved plat of survey provided for by this section."

That section 9 of said act be amended by striking out from the last paragraph therefrom the following proviso, to wit:

"Provided, however, That any person who, in good faith, prior to the passage of this act, had discovered and opened or located a mine of coal or other mineral shall have a preference right of purchase for ninety days from and after the official filing in the local land office of the approved plat of survey provided for by this section."

Mr. MANTLE. Mr. President, I desire to state, in explanation of the amendment, that at the last session of Congress treaties, one with the Blackfeet Indians and one with the Belknap Indians in the State of Montana, were adopted. After getting into a committee of conference, an addition was made to the bill as it passed the Senate, embracing the language quoted in the amendment, and which I now seek to have stricken out. That amendment provided that where locations had been made within these Indian reservations prior to the passage of the law and the ratification of the treaty they should be deemed to be good locations; that they should be legal. This addition was made in the conference committee and was not a part of the original treaty as presented.

I believe that the proviso was incorporated in order to make these treaties conform in this particular to some other treaties which had already been ratified. The result, however, of the incorporation of that clause in the treaty has been to create a great deal of dissatisfaction among the people in the State of Montana. There is a belief that certain parties have thus been favored at the expense of others, and if possible I should like now to remedy this matter by having those clauses stricken out.

I therefore submit the amendment, to the end that the feeling of dissatisfaction and complaint upon this score may be done away with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer an amendment to be inserted on page 35, after line 3.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, after the amendment adopted after line 3, it is proposed to insert:

That the annuities of the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians arising under the treaty of July 23, 1851, between said bands of Indians and the United States, which annuities were declared forfeited by the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians," approved February 16, 1863, be, and the same are hereby, restored and continued from the time of the last payment before said act forfeiting the same to July 1, 1902, the date of the expiration of said treaty of July 23, 1851, for which purpose a sum of money sufficient to pay said annuities is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and after deducting all sums actually paid to said Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians, by reason of said treaty of July 23, 1851, the sum remaining unpaid, after deducting and paying attorneys' fees in accordance with agreement with said Indians on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the balance shall be paid per capita to said Indians or disbursed for their benefit for such objects and purposes and in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may deem for their best interests, or deposited in the Treasury for the use and benefit of said Indians, and paid to them or expended for their benefit in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct; and on all sums remaining in the Treasury of the United States said Indians shall receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, said interest to be paid to them per capita on the 1st day of November of each year.

Mr. ALLISON. That is new and independent and very important legislation. I make the point of order that it is not in order on this bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I dislike very much to disagree with my learned friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. It occurs to me that it is not independent legislation at all, or new legislation. It is germane strictly to the purposes of this bill. The object of the amendment is simply to restore these Indians to certain rights that were taken away from them by the act of 1863, and after what is known as the New Ulm massacre. I can not understand wherein it can be considered as independent legislation.

I have no desire to debate the matter for any length of time. It occurs to me that at first blush it strikes the mind that it is germane to the pending bill. The amendment has been submitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs; it was passed upon favorably by that committee, and ordered sent to the Committee on Appropriations. Why the Committee on Appropriations did not see fit to put this amendment on the bill I do not know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment contains general legislation, and is therefore not in order, if the point of order is made.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to contend with the Chair, and do not propose to, but there ought to be some reason given for the point of order. The mere assertion that the point of order is well taken does not prove anything at all. It does not convince anybody that that is true.

Now, I think that general legislation—and I believe it so strikes the average mind—is legislation upon some independent subject, that is, not germane to the purpose of the bill. I know it is the most convenient thing in the world for the Committee on Appropriations to make the point of order, as they call it, and have the Chair sustain the point of order, and by that means squelch the amendment. But that does not prove anything. It does not prove that the amendment is not germane to the bill, nor does it prove that it is general legislation. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair upon that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question before the Senate is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BACON. I hope the amendment will be read.

Mr. ALLEN. It is suggested——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me for a moment, I suggest, if the matter is to be pressed, that the Senator from Nebraska let it go over until to-morrow. This is an amendment which involves from a million to a million four hundred thousand dollars, and it is to be followed by another amendment which the Senator from Nebraska will offer, involving an unascertained amount, as this is unascertained. So it is important legislation and is absolutely new, and if we are to have a discussion of the amendment as respects its merits it can not be very well gone into to-night. So I trust the Senator from Nebraska will not press the amendment at this time.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no disposition to do that. I am perfectly willing that it shall go over. I have another amendment upon the same subject.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DAVIS. I rose for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Nebraska to say that he has another amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir; I have two or three, which I hope will meet a better fate.

On page 34, after line 6, I move to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 6, on page 34, it is proposed to insert:

That the Santee Sioux Indians of Nebraska and the Flandreau Sioux Indians of South Dakota, formerly known as and being a confederacy of the Medawakanton and Wapakoota Sioux Indians, be, and they are hereby, restored to all rights, privileges, and benefits they and their ancestors had and enjoyed under the treaty entered into September 29, 1837, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, between Joel R. Poinsett, on behalf of the Government of the United States, and the Medawakanton Sioux Indians, by certain of their chief men, proclaimed June 15, 1838, and the treaty entered into between the United States, through Luke Lea and Alexander Ramsey, as commissioners, and the Medawakanton and Wapakoota Sioux Indians, by certain of their chief men, and proclaimed by Millard Fillmore, as President of the United States, August 5, 1851, and all treaties and acts of Congress supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof: Provided, That the titles to all lands that were owned by the said Medawakanton and Wapakoota Indians that have been extinguished since the 18th day of August, 1862, by treaty with said Indians, or by act of Congress, are hereby quieted in the United States or its grantees, as the case may be: And provided further, That the said Medawakanton and Wapakoota Indians now known as and being a confederacy of the Santee Sioux Indians of Nebraska and the Flandreau Sioux Indians of South Dakota, shall be paid by the United States the sum of 95 cents per acre for all lands that were owned by them, respectively, on the 18th day of August, A. D. 1862, and which were confiscated by the United States by an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reasons of depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians," approved February 16, 1863, be, and the same are hereby, restored and continued from the time of the last payment before said act forfeiting the same, to July 1, 1902, the date of the expiration of said treaty of August 5, 1851, for which purpose a sum of money sufficient to pay said annuities is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and after deducting all sums actually paid to said Santee and Flandreau Indians, by reason of said treaty of August 5, 1851, the sum remaining unpaid, after deducting and paying attorney's fees in accordance with agreement with said Indians on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the balance shall be paid per capita to said Indians or disbursed for their benefit for such objects and purposes and in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may deem for their best interests, or deposited in the Treasury for the use and benefit of said Indians, and paid to them or expended for their benefit in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, and on all sums remaining in the Treasury of the United States said Indians shall receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, said interest to be paid to them per capita on the 1st day of November of each year.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order upon the amendment that it changes many existing laws and modifies several treaties.

Mr. PALMER. Is this an amendment proposed by the committee?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; it is an amendment proposed by myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether the Committee on Indian Affairs did not sanction the amendment?

Mr. ALLEN. The Committee on Indian Affairs sanctioned the amendment. It has made a very elaborate report upon it. There was not a dissenting voice in the committee.

I have no desire to press the matter this evening. I am perfectly willing to let it go over, as the previous amendment went over a moment ago; but I will press it to-morrow morning, and I will keep pressing it from the time the Senate opens until it closes until there is a fair and equitable hearing of the rights of these Indians, and I shall not be cut off from debate by this very convenient point of order which is made upon all these meritorious amendments.

Mr. WHITE. I trust the Senator from Nebraska does not intend to curtail the expressions of the Senate in regard to the rights of the Cubans, which would seem to be somewhat intermingled with the rights of the Indians.

Mr. ALLEN. The Cubans and the Indians are a good deal alike here. They are used as a very convenient football when we do not desire to do anything else.

Mr. WHITE. I fully agree with the Senator from Nebraska, but I sometimes criticise votes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa insist upon the point of order?

Mr. ALLISON. I do insist upon the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is obnoxious to the third clause of the sixteenth rule, which provides against general legislation.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I appeal from the ruling of the Chair, and shall insist——

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will not the Senator withdraw the amendment and offer it to-morrow?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; I will let it stand exactly in this shape.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I hope the matter will not be pressed now. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLEN. I am perfectly willing to let the amendment go over, but I want the appeal to go over with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over, by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. Subject to the appeal.

Mr. ALLEN. I want the appeal to go with it. I now offer an amendment to be inserted at the bottom of page 26.

The SECRETARY. At the bottom of page 26 it is proposed to insert:

Adult allottees of land in the Peoria and Miami Indian reservations in the Quapaw Agency, Ind. T., who have received allotments of 200 acres each, may sell 100 acres each of said allotments and all inherited lands, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This involves another controverted question.

Mr. ALLEN. There can not be any controversy about it. Congress last year passed an identically similar provision as respects the Wyandotte Indians.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to examine the amendment and talk it over with the Senator from Nebraska and see what there is to it. I do not understand it now.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Therefore I think it ought to go over.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection to its going over.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to make the point of order on that provision, unless the Senator has a recommendation from the Secretary of the Interior or some one who has made an examination of the subject. I do not think we ought to authorize the sale of Indian lands unless we have information about it, to be communicated to the Senate and placed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not consulted the Secretary of the Interior about the matter. I have not considered it my duty to do so. Congress passed last year an identically similar provision as respects the Wyandotte Indians, and I have not conceived it at any time to be my duty to consult the Secretary of the Interior as to the discharge of my duty except at such times as I felt unable to discharge it myself. If the Senator from Iowa desires to make the point of order on the amendment, I should like to have it made now, and let the amendment go over with the others.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Nebraska indulge me with a word?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator certainly knows how careful Congress has been not to allow Indians to sell their allotted lands.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. Congress has been free to allow leases of such lands, but the right of alienation has been very carefully reserved in order to protect the Indians from parting with their lands for a song.

Now, the Senator can hardly be serious when he says that if he proposes an amendment of this kind, to allow Indians to sell their lands wholly or any portion of them, the Senate ought to take his word for the fitness and propriety of the amendment, and that there is anything harsh or censorious in suggesting that there ought to be an official recommendation from the officials of the Government to guard these Indians and protect them against imposition. It seems to me that he ought not to take the view he does of the point of order made upon the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Possibly I ought not, but, however, I do take that view. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the amendment provides that these allottees can alienate their lands only upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. He must approve of it before that can be done. Congress last year passed identically this law in so far as it applied to the Wyandotte Indians. If it was good law for the Wyandotte Indians, why is it not good for these Indians?

Mr. CHANDLER. Necessarily, the Senator will allow me to say, there must be a difference between different tribes. How are we to know that the one tribe is circumstanced as the other tribe is?

Mr. ALLEN. There can not be any difference in the world. They are both civilized tribes. These Indians are as civilized as the Wyandottes; and, in fact, if there is any difference, the difference is in favor of these Indians. Now, why the necessity of going over to the Secretary of the Interior, who has been there about six weeks, taking his opinion upon the subject? I presume that when the good people of New Hampshire sent my distinguished friend here they expected him to act upon his judgment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not upon questions of this kind, by any means. They would expect me to act in such a case upon the opinion of the regularly constituted authorities of the Department.

Mr. ALLEN. And they have been wise in their selection.

Mr. CHANDLER. I admit that.

Mr. ALLEN. If it is necessary to consult the Secretary of the Interior, then would it not be a wise conclusion for us to arrive at for every man here to go home except the chairman of the committee and the Secretary of the Interior and the presiding officer and the clerks?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Nebraska quite misunderstands me. I undertake to say that matters of this kind in the usual course of business in the Senate are either examined by a committee or come here on the recommendation of the officers in charge of the administration of Indian affairs. That is all I meant to say. I do not wish to disparage in any way the Secretary of the Interior or to pass any encomium upon him because he happens to have been there only six weeks or a few months. What I think ought to be done in these matters is to have them pass in the regular and ordinary course of legislation. That is usual, as the Senator very well knows. Now, I will ask him if the Committee on Indian Affairs recommend this provision?

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President, they have not recommended it; but what would that signify?

Mr. ALLISON. It ought to signify a great deal.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; it ought to signify, as the Senator from Iowa says, a great deal, but it does not signify anything. Less than twenty minutes ago I offered two amendments to this bill that were unanimously approved by the Committee on Indian Affairs and they met the objection of the Senator from Iowa, and his objection was sustained by the Chair. What does that signify? Here are reports, printed reports, involving 25 or 30 pages of printed matter, giving the whole history of those amendments, and yet here, with a snap of the finger, the Senator from Iowa objects to these amendments, the Chair sustains him, and the Senator from Nebraska is remediless. Suppose we should run the same gantlet with the proposed amendment, would not the Senator from Iowa have risen at his desk and suggested that it was general legislation, and would not the Chair equally as quickly ruled that it was general legislation, and therefore objectionable? Why go to the expense of printing a report and having an examination if it is to go off the bill anyway? Now, I shall insist upon this amendment as upon the others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Iowa to insist upon the point of order?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not make it at the moment. It can go over until to-morrow, as I understand the bill is going over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to come in after the one just offered; and out of four I beg to express the hope that one of them may go upon the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the bottom of page 26 insert:

That the territory comprising the Osage and Kansas Indian reservations be, and is hereby, detached from the Territory of Oklahoma and attached to the Indian Territory, and the said territory comprising said reservations shall be and is hereby attached to and made a part of the northern judicial district of the said Indian Territory, and at least two terms of the United States court therein shall be held each year at Pawhuska, at such times as the judge of said district shall fix and determine.

Mr. ALLEN. Now, if the Senator in charge of the bill will listen to me a moment, I am satisfied that he will agree that this amendment may go upon the bill. This is my last effort to-night to put an amendment on the bill.

The capital of the Osage Nation is Pawhuska, located almost in the center of the Osage Nation. I think it is quite 40 miles distant from either border. No court is held in that territory. The courts of Oklahoma west of there assume to exercise jurisdiction over that territory, and it is very inconvenient for litigants and witnesses and counsel to attend those courts. They have to go, I think, something like 60 or 70 miles, possibly farther, to reach the court. This amendment transfers the jurisdiction over the Osage Nation to the northern district of the Indian Territory, over which Judge Springer now presides, and establishes a term of court at Pawhuska, the capital of the Osage Nation, and by that means making it convenient for litigants and parties having business before the court. In talking this morning with Colonel Freeman, the agent at that agency, this proposed amendment met his approval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, after line 4, insert:

And nothing in section 27 of chapter 543, volume 26, of the United States Statutes at Large, pages 1038 and 1039, shall be construed to apply to any contract for services for the prosecution of any claim against the United States or the Indians named in said section, and which had been prosecuted to its final allowance by the Department before which it was prosecuted within the period stated in said contracts, and said contracts shall not be deemed or taken to have been in full force and legal effect until the date of their official approval by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the date of the approval thereof officially indorsed thereon by said Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as required by the provisions of the fourth paragraph of section 2103 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and in all such cases the Secretary of the Interior shall cause all claims for service under such agreements to be adjusted, audited, allowed, and paid out of any moneys in the Treasury belonging to the bands or tribes to which such Indians belong, and so much money as is necessary for that purpose is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the amount so paid shall be charged against any fund to the credit of said Indians, tribes, bands, or individuals, in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the object of the amendment can be stated in a very few words. It applies to the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Indians, or rather to some portions of them. As a result of the massacre of 1862, the annuities of those Indians were entirely confiscated. Some 250 of those bands were never in the massacre, but were in the service of the United States or conducting captive women and children back to their homes in Minnesota. Some 250 who were involved in the common confiscation retained General Sanborn, of St. Paul, to prosecute claims for restoration of their pro rata part of those annuities. He proceeded in that prosecution, with the result that the Department of the Interior allowed on behalf of these 250 or 270 men, as their pro rata part of the confiscated annuities, some $500,000, upon which his compensation at 10 per cent was about $50,000. He held individual contracts with each of these scouts. By the legislation of 1891 that money, instead of being turned over to these men per capita, was distributed to all the rest of the tribe, the remainder of whom had not signed any contract with him. Those who had not signed contracts object to paying, and those who had signed contracts paid, but they could not pay upon the basis that they would have paid had they received the full amount allotted to them, because it had all been lessened by a distribution to the entire band.

The act of 1891, unintentionally by its framers, did an injustice to General Sanborn, because it provided that only contracts then in force should be recognized in the payment. His contract was made in 1877, and was for twelve years. It was void until it was approved by the Department of the Interior. It was not approved until 1882. The twelve years had elapsed in 1891. He contended that the contract took effect only from the time it was approved.

I will state that this amendment has been examined by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It, I believe, has the approval of every member of the committee. It was to have been reported six or eight months ago, but for some reason or other it never has been reported. The amendment carries no appropriation whatever, but merely enables the Secretary of the Interior to audit and adjust this claim.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me ask the Senator from Minnesota if this claim is audited and adjusted will it not be paid necessarily out of the Treasury?

Mr. DAVIS. It is to be paid out of the Treasury, but is a charge to this Indian fund.

Mr. ALLISON. It is charged to the Sisseton and Wahpeton fund?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. To their annuity fund?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know, of course, about the details of which the Senator speaks. I have no doubt they are correct. But my impression is that this money will come out of the Treasury in the end, because the Sissetons and Wahpetons will insist next year, or the year thereafter, that we had no right to appropriate their funds in this way. If the Committee on Indian Affairs believes that this is a just claim and ought to be paid to them, although it is a claim that ought properly to go upon the deficiency bill, I do not know that I shall object to it. It only displays, however, the complications and intricacies of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska by disclosing that the money which was to be paid to the Indian scouts of the Sissetons and Wahpetons, amounting to $500,000, or whatever the amount, was distributed to the whole tribe and not to these scouts.

Mr. DAVIS. They got their share, but their share was lessened.

Mr. ALLISON. They got their share, being members of the tribe. After we have all these matters adjusted, of course the scouts will in some way insist that they should be reimbursed for the amount they have lost. So this is a complicated case involving two or three or four treaties and several statutes. I do not wish to stand in the way of any person who has prosecuted these claims properly, nor do I wish in any way to oppose the amendment if it has only the purpose of paying to an attorney what he ought to have out of the tribal funds which can properly be used for that purpose. The Senator from Minnesota of course must be more familiar with that than I can be.

Mr. DAVIS. I will read four lines of the amendment:

And so much money as is necessary for that purpose is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the amount so paid shall be charged against any fund to the credit of said Indians, tribes, bands, or individuals in the Treasury of the United States.

There is a fund there.

Mr. ALLISON. There is an ample fund there. These Sisseton and Wahpeton Sioux have a million and a half dollars on deposit in the Treasury drawing 5 per cent interest, which we gave to them in consideration of their relinquishing their right to the annuities which the Senator from Nebraska talks about.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. I know we have some difference about that; but if this is to be paid out of their fund, of course if it is only a charge to their fund; but the question as to how it shall be paid will come up hereafter. It is to be paid out of the Treasury. I think, if the Senator will allow me to make the suggestion, that it ought to be paid directly from the annuities from the interest upon the fund held in the Treasury by the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if in his opinion the proposed amendment involves general legislation?

Mr. ALLISON. I think it does; but it is a very small affair, as the Senator very well knows, and I do not wish to interfere with what appears to be a just settlement of a small matter, as this seems to be. If the Senator desires to make a point of order on the amendment, of course he can do so.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I do not want to kill any legislation that way. I want to kill it on its merits. I only wanted to emphasize the fact, however, that there seems to be some distinction in making points of order upon measures where they are all open to the point of order. I have offered two amendments bearing upon this same subject——

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DAVIS. I have drawn an amendment which covers the suggestion of the Senator, providing that the money shall be paid directly out of the fund.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator sees that the objection made by the Senator from Nebraska——

Mr. DAVIS. Let it go over until to-morrow, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is obnoxious to the first and third clauses of the sixteenth rule.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let it go over.

Mr. DAVIS. Let it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to offer an amendment to be inserted at the end of line 8, on page 67.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of line 8, on page 67:

That it being impracticable to provide homes in the Indian Territory for the Absentee Wyandotte Indians as contemplated by the acts of Congress approved June 10, 1896, and August 15, 1894, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to use the money appropriated therefor by acts of August 15, 1894, and March 2, 1895, in locating homes for said Indians upon any lands that may be available and suitable for such purpose, except that out of said money so appropriated as aforesaid, R. B. Armstrong, attorney for said Absentee Wyandottes, be allowed and paid the sum of $1,000 for services and expenses already incurred in and about such matters in behalf of said Indians.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state as to this amendment that Congress made an appropriation first of $15,000 of money which belongs to these Indians to try and purchase land for them in the Indian Territory. Afterwards it was found that land could not be secured for that sum, and Congress afterwards appropriated $6,000 more. It was then found impossible to secure lands in the Indian Territory. These Indians sent one of their number, and he has been here two or three winters on this matter, and has been to the Indian Territory, and has spent a great deal of time and money in trying to secure these locations.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommended that all this money be distributed among the Indians, after paying this representative of theirs $2,100, or 10 per cent of it. This amendment, I see, provides that he shall be paid $1,000. The Secretary of the Interior did not agree with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and thought the effort to secure homes for these people should not be abandoned. This amendment provides that the effort shall be continued to secure homes for these people wherever they can be procured. They can not be procured, under the existing acts, in the Indian Territory. I think, therefore, that it is entirely proper and covers the question. I have letters here from the Department in regard to the subject, if it is desired that they shall be read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have two committee amendments yet not disposed of, if the Senator will wait a moment.

Mr. STEWART. It will take but a moment. Will the Senator give way now?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. On page 67, line 2, after the word "dollars," I move the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment already adopted, on page 67, line 2, insert:

To reimburse the county of Ormsby, State of Nevada, for money expended in the purchase of improvements on lands donated to the Government for an Indian school, $6,375.

Mr. STEWART. In 1888 Congress passed a law which made an appropriation of $25,000 to establish an Indian school in Ormsby County, Nev. I will state the condition of things at the time. There was a tribe of Indians in Ormsby County known as the Washoes. They never had had any appropriation from the Government and always had been friendly. In fact, they all lived about the capital at Carson. There was a large number of children among them, and there was a general desire that there should be a school established. The Piute tribe had two reservations about 75 miles north and south, with railroad accommodations to that point, which made this a central point and accommodated them all.

An Indian school has been established, and it is doing much good. A condition of the appropriation was that the lands should be furnished free. The legislature authorized Ormsby County to issue bonds not to exceed $10,000. It was not expected that a very large portion of it would be used. The county commissioners used a thousand dollars of it and bought the requisite amount of land, good land, but it had no improvements upon it and no water upon it. They would have been required to purchase water rights and to make improvements. The commissioner, Noble, I think, was his name, was sent out there to examine it. He rejected for those reasons the lands which they had purchased. They then advertised for other farms, and quite a number of offers were made of reasonably cheap property, but there was one farm which had a water right and had nine buildings on it and was under a high state of cultivation.

The Indian agent insisted upon having this particular farm. He reported that the improvements on it were worth $6,375. The desire to have these Indians provided for induced the commissioners to take the responsibility to buy the farm, costing considerably more than that. The aggregate that they expended amounted to $10,000. One thousand of it, however, was expended for land that was not accepted, and an act was passed to deed that back. But the amount for interest and principal involved the sum of $12,000 up to date. There have been a great many donations made of sites for Indian schools, but most of them are simply donations of land. The land in any part of the county, without the improvements, could have been bought for from $1,000 to $1,500, but the Government would then have been compelled to purchase water rights and make improvements. The improvements were extra.

I have communicated with the Department, and there are a few cases where the donations included improvements, but none have been reported where it was done by taxation. It was where there were some institutions and persons had improvements upon it, and they have donated it. The general donations have been of land without improvements.

The county of Ormsby is financially embarrassed. The taxation is over 3 per cent on a very high valuation, and this amount of money becomes oppressive. Inasmuch as the Washoes never received a dollar, and this was specially for their benefit, I think it but equitable and fair that the Government of the United States should pay for the amount of the improvements on that land. They hesitated a long time and presented other sections, but the agent was very anxious to secure this particular farm. He was right, because it was worth vastly more to the Indians than any other land that could have been selected. But the anxiety to have the school was such and the necessity for it so great that they made this expenditure. It seems to me not unreasonable that compensation for the improvements should be made. The amendment, without any interest, gives the exact amount at which the agent estimated the value of the nine buildings and the water right, the fencing, and the agricultural improvements that are upon the land.

Mr. ALLISON. This seems to be a very equitable case, as stated by the Senator from Nevada, but inasmuch as there is no estimate for it and it is not reported from any committee——

Mr. STEWART. It is reported from a committee. The Committee on Indian Affairs have authorized it to be reported.

Mr. ALLISON. To be added to the bill?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will be glad to have that fact appear from the desk. I ask that we may have the record stated.

Mr. STEWART. That is correct. It is authorized by them. It was brought up in the committee in the first instance and there was not a quorum present. Afterwards a majority of the committee authorized their names to be used in recommending this particular appropriation, and it so appears on the back of the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. If it has been reported and referred to the Committee on Appropriations——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment has not been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, so far as the record shows.

Mr. STEWART. It was not referred to the Committee on Appropriations, for it came in after the Committee on Appropriations had reported the bill. Will it have to go over?

Mr. ALLISON. I feel constrained to make the point of order on it.

Mr. STEWART. Then I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It will then be in order to-morrow morning, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose so.

Mr. STEWART. I think it is pretty hard to make a point of order against an amendment of this kind. I think it is very extraordinary that a point of order is made on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to sustain the point of order made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON. I will state that the Committee on Indian Affairs gave this matter their full consideration some two weeks ago and reported back the amendment through the Senator from Nevada. The committee came to a unanimous agreement that it was an equitable and just case and should be allowed.

Mr. STEWART. I think I did refer the amendment to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order, the Chair thinks, is well taken.

Mr. WILSON. Whether it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations or not, it seems to have been the intention that it should have been referred, and perhaps there was some oversight somewhere.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to move an amendment to come in at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following:

To build and properly furnish a house for a boarding school for the Hualapai Indians of Arizona, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $40,000.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator if that is not general legislation?

Mr. HOAR. It is a mere expenditure. There is an offer to purchase a very valuable farm and give it to these Indians on condition that the boarding school be equipped and furnished. There is no general legislation about it.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, but I understand this to be new legislation.

Mr. HOAR. It is not legislation at all. It is merely an appropriation for executing a law.

Mr. ALLEN. I infer that this is a new provision, and that money is to be appropriated to purchase certain property.

Mr. HOAR. To build and equip a house on property given to the Government for this purpose.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I understand what it is, but I simply wanted to make a parliamentary inquiry as to whether it was not general legislation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state, in answer to the Senator's parliamentary inquiry, that if a point of order is made, the Chair will decide it.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know that I want to make the point of order on the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendment be again read.

Mr. ALLEN. The Committee on Appropriations are, of course, perfectly familiar with the question of whether this is general legislation or not, whether it has been properly estimated for, and whether it has passed through the Committee on Indian Affairs; and if the Senator in charge of the bill will explain that to the Senate, I shall be glad. I call his attention to the matter. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes an amendment to purchase some property, proposing to expend the sum of $40,000 for that purpose. Not being in charge of the bill, and not having a great deal to do with it at this precise moment, I inquire of the Senator from South Dakota, who ought to know, by virtue of his position, whether this amendment is not obnoxious to the rule which has been enforced here this evening with reference to other amendments?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say that I do not care to make the point of order upon the amendment which has been offered.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendment may be read.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit that if the point of order is going to be made upon one, it ought to be made upon all.

Mr. HOAR. This is a mere proposition to give a very valuable and costly farm to the United States for the exclusive purpose of these Indians. That is all there is of it.

Mr. ALLEN. My proposition was a mere proposition to restore certain Indians to their rights. I wanted to restore certain Indians to their rights here awhile ago; nobody disputed their right; the law gave them these rights away back in 1851, and even before that, and I simply wanted to restore them. Before I could get my wishes presented to the Senate in intelligible shape, the point of order was made upon me and sustained. Now, I do not insist upon that rule being applied to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], because there is a great deal of distinction between that Senator and myself; but I simply wanted to know—and I ask in all seriousness—why this rule, which is applied with such vigor and with such apparent asperity and acrimony to legislation offered a few moments ago, should not be applied to proposed legislation when offered by the Senator from Massachusetts?

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] declines to make this point of order. If one is vulnerable to the point of order, the other is vulnerable. I would not say for a moment, nor would I have any Senator to infer, that I mean to charge that there is anything like favoritism here; but I think, if a rule is to be applied to the Santee Sioux Indians and the Sissetons and Wahpetons, who are poor people out in a poor country struggling for a livelihood, where they stand in absolute need, that the point of order ought to be made upon a proposed amendment which is to expend $40,000 not for any necessaries, but for some of the luxuries of life. I do not suppose it would be possible for me to induce the Senator in charge of this bill to make the point of order. I suppose he waived it out of respect for the courtesies which were interchanged between the Senator from Massachusetts and himself on yesterday evening. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that the Senator from Massachusetts is a most amiable gentleman, and of course if any favors were to be extended, I should extend them to him.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following:

To build and properly furnish a house for a boarding school for the Hualapai Indians, of Arizona, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $40,000.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not understand the Senator from South Dakota; possibly it was my fault. Did I understand the Senator from South Dakota to say that he waived the point of order in respect to the memory of Miles Standish [laughter], or in respect to some other matter?

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WILSON. Is the Senator from South Dakota the only Senator on the floor who can make a point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any Senator has the right to make a point of order.

Mr. WILSON. Then, what is to prevent the Senator from Nebraska himself making the point of order? If he is so anxious about it, why does he not make it himself?

Mr. ALLEN. Nothing whatever.

Mr. WILSON. I did not know but that there was some rule on the subject.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order against the amendment, it not having been estimated for and not having been reported from any committee. If the Secretary of the Interior desires to expend this money, there is ample provision already in the bill for him in the general appropriation for educational purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say, in justice to the ladies who have raised this sum of money which they propose to give to the United States, that this amendment was proposed at the request of a very benevolent body of ladies, who have spent a great deal of their own money and gathered a good deal for Indian education, particularly one lady, whose name, if I should mention it, would be recognized by almost the whole country. They propose to purchase for these Indians a very valuable and costly farm. They desire that the United States shall put up a proper house, which $40,000 would erect, and perhaps a less sum would answer. Then they will give the farm. It is a sheer gift of what in some way or other the United States is bound to do.

I thought it likely that the committee might be of opinion that the details of the matter should be submitted more directly to the Secretary of the Interior, and I find no particular fault with the course of the Senator from Iowa, but I rather hoped he would let it go, because the Secretary of the Interior is obliged to expend the whole sum.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will see, if he will examine the bill, that there is a large sum appropriated for the maintenance of schools, and also a large sum for the purchase of sites and the erection of school buildings. So that, if these ladies desire to aid in the cause of education, I have no doubt they can make their appeal to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOAR. I think that is an excellent reason, and the Senator from Iowa generally has excellent reasons for whatever he does or says. I am very sorry, however, that after waiting about fifteen minutes without making the point of order he should be nagged into doing so by the insistence of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I called for the reading of the amendment. I did not hear it when it was first read, as my attention was diverted to a number of other matters, as Senators know it frequently is, and so I called for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I have no complaint to make of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not necessary, then, for the Senator to make insinuations respecting my delay and to say that I was nagged into making the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please suspend until the Senator from Arkansas states his point of order.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask what question is pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question now pending before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I desired before the point of order was made to be permitted to make a statement about this matter.

What happened was exactly this: The matter was referred to the Committee on Appropriations days ago, and they, of course, considered it as everything is considered there. I moved the amendment, and the Senator in charge of the bill said he did not desire to make a point of order against it. It had been read three or four times, and then the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] made a speech at some length, saying that he had not any objection to the amendment; he did not want to make a point of order—but wanted to know whether it had not been made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW]—because the Senator from Massachusetts had certain amiable qualities, which I will frankly admit the possession of on my part. Thereupon, after that speech, the amendment having been read two or three times, my honorable friend from Iowa made his point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say——

Mr. HOAR. I certainly accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. ALLISON. It was a very important matter that we were asked to adopt as an amendment, and it was read twice—once at my request and once before the request—as Senators probably know. I asked to have it read the second time, as I did not hear it read the first time, and when I heard it read I made the point of order. Of course the Senator may have his opinion, but he is mistaken in saying that I was goaded or pressed by the Senator from Nebraska into making the point of order. I have felt, and feel now, that if we are to pass the appropriation bills, especially this Indian appropriation bill, it is not wise for us to load it down with amendments which are not in order, and with amendments which propose the payment of claims and things of that sort.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to state to the Senator from Iowa that the Senator from Nebraska, in the speech he made, did not raise the point of order on the amendment, but seemed to think that the Senator from South Dakota should do so, but that Senator said he would not make the point of order, and then the Senator from Iowa got up and made it.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. PALMER. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President. If the conversation between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Iowa is over, I desire to make a suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and the Chair now recognizes the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. ALLISON. I yield the floor to the Senator from Illinois with great pleasure. I have no doubt he has some matter of substance that he wants to speak upon.

Mr. PALMER. I imagine I have.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator will allow me only one sentence?

Mr. PALMER. The Senator from Massachusetts can say that one sentence.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to assure the Senator from Iowa that nothing could happen to make me either guilty of any act of disrespect or thought of disrespect toward him.

Mr. PALMER. I want to inquire what is the parliamentary situation of the amendment on pages 70, 71, and 72? I inquire whether that has been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has been passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. PALMER. I want to move to strike out all after the word "purposes," in line 24 on page 70, down to and including the word "actions," on page 71, line 6, upon which I shall ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHOUP. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 23 on page 66, after the word "year," it is proposed to insert:

In addition to the extension heretofore granted.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This amendment simply provides for a year's additional time for homesteaders to prove up on their lands where they have taken lands upon Indian reservations. It is simply an amendment to the House provision, which I think does not give an extension.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the clause be read as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the clause so as to read:

That the settlers who purchased with the condition annexed of actual settlement on all ceded Indian reservations be, and they are hereby, granted an extension of one year in addition to the extension heretofore granted, in which to make payments as now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer an amendment which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, after the amendments already adopted, it is proposed to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the scouts and soldiers and their descendants of the Sisseton, Wahpeton, Medawakanton, and Wapakoota Sioux Indians who have not been paid, if any there be, who, after thorough investigation, are found to be entitled to such payment, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard to this matter. It appears that in making up the rolls some of these Indians were left out, and he says it will take $9,027 to pay them. The amendment is for $10,000. He says the amount named, that is, $10,000, will pay twenty-five scouts and soldiers omitted from the pay rolls of 1895, if that number were omitted. The amendment is so drawn that no payment will be made unless after thorough examination the Department decides that it is due.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator have that letter inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the letter be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 19, 1897.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter dated the 15th instant, inclosing copy of an amendment which your colleague, Mr. KIEFER, proposes to introduce to the Indian appropriation bill when it is considered. You ask to be advised whether or not the amendment should be incorporated in the bill.

In reply, I return the amendment with advice that the same should be incorporated in the bill. The amount named, $10,000, will pay twenty-five scouts and soldiers omitted from the pay roll of 1895, if that number were omitted.

Very respectfully,

D. M. BROWNING,
Commissioner.

Hon. J. S. SHERMAN,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 8, 1897.

SIR: In reply to your letter of 4th instant I have the honor to state that the names of the following deceased scouts and soldiers of the Sisseton, Wahpeton, Medawakanton, Wapakoota bands of Sioux Indians, to wit:

1. Ta su su,
2. Wa su e da ya,
3. Wryins Ka na nee,
4. Edward La Ramie,
5. Jos. Robnitt (No. 6 not on list furnished),
7. John Other Day,
8. Alfred Miller,
9. Ta chau pu ma za,
10. Peter Boyer,
11. S. A. Adams,
12. James Nam de cha,
13. Louis Vasseur,
14. Peter Leclaire,
15. Moses Moore,
16. William A. Findley,
17. John Campbell,
18. Peter Ortebise,
19. Barry J. Wells,
20. Michael La Riviere,
21. Sa ga ya ma zu, or the names of their descendants and heirs, do not appear on final roll paid by Special Agent Shelby during the months of October and November, 1895, the per capita of which was $391.65.

It is also found that of the above-mentioned scouts and soldiers, the names of—

1. Ta su su,
3. Wryins Ka na nee,
11. S. A. Adams,
12. James Nam de cha, do not appear on the rolls paid in 1892 and 1894, based upon the censuses of 1891 and 1893, therefore do not appear to be entitled.

The following names, to wit:

Wau di ey ya, 75, M.,

Ia te pi ya, or Ahan zi wi ca yo, 68, M.,

appear on the original Elrod roll, but do not appear on any subsequent scout and soldier roll, nor can they be identified on Sisseton roll, upon which payment was made in accordance with provisions of agreement entered into between the United States and the Sisseton tribe of Indians, approved December 12, 1889 (26 Stats., page 1036). The amount due each, if found to be entitled, would be their proportionate shares of $305.81 and $391.65, respectively.

To pay these people, if, after a thorough investigation, they are found to be entitled, will require the sum of $9,027.92.

Very respectfully,

D. M. BROWNING, Commissioner.

Hon. A. R. KIEFER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I desire to offer two or three amendments which I should like to have pending. I do not propose to ask that they be acted on to-night. I suggest that in line 17, on page 58, the following insertion be made, after the word "law:"

Provided, That said appellate court may, in its discretion, designate one place in addition to those at which courts are now held.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Is that in the Five Civilized Tribes?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think that amendment should be adopted. In the northern district, west of the railroad, there is no provision for a court in all that country,

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is true, and that is the reason I think the discretion should be vested in the appellate court.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think, however, the amendment should read "at such other places as may be designated by the judge of said court."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Say "by the court." Let it be done by the appellate court.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the suggestion of the Senator in charge of the bill is better than mine.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Nebraska on my left [Mr. ALLEN] has already provided for one place for holding court in the Indian Territory under an amendment which we have agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. No, that is hardly the fact. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska provided for holding a court in the Osage country.

Mr. ALLISON. I know, but it is attached to the Indian Territory. The judges will be spread all over the Indian Territory, including the place designated by the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have no doubt there should be a court held at that place.

Mr. ALLISON. I only call attention to it.

Mr. ALLEN. The amendment I offered was agreed to.

Mr. BATE. I suggest there should be a point of order made to that whole section, that it is general legislation; but I do not propose to raise it now. If, however, the committee amendment falls, this amendment will fall with it.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he thinks, if this legislation is enacted, the judges will designate a place to hold court?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is the intention of it.

Mr. WILSON. I want to say that some two or three years ago we created an appellate court in this country, and we left it in the power of the judges to designate two other places for holding court, but the people of the West have never been able to get those Federal judges to designate any place to hold court, although the law clearly contemplated that they should do so. If we enact similar legislation here upon an appropriation bill, it might be that those judges, consulting their ease, as the appellate court judges have in the western district of which my State is a part, would compel litigants to travel 1,800 miles in order to reach a court, and you might not get your court established after all. Why not designate where you wish to hold it absolutely and unconditionally? Of course it is a matter for the Senator, however.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I believe that the appellate court in that country are the best judges as to where the court should be held. That there should be some additional places at which court should be held I have no doubt, and I think the court is better qualified to determine that question than we would be without some investigation. There are Senators here who are insisting that the court should be held at one place or another, and I do not know whether those selections are the best or not; but whatever the necessity may be, if presented to the appellate court, I have not a doubt that it will be promptly decided, and I am willing to accept the amendment as suggested by the Senator from South Dakota. I hope the Senator will send the amendment to the desk.

Now, I propose to offer and have pending an amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, after line 4, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall, through an officer of the Government, disburse $300,000 of the money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Creek Nation of Indians, only for the payment of the debt to the Government of the Creek Nation: Provided, That no debt shall be paid until by investigation the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that said nation of Indians incurred said debt, or issued its warrants representing the same, for a full and valuable consideration, and that there was no fraud in connection with the incurring of said debt or the issuing of warrants.

Mr. ALLISON. Where does that come in?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. On page 18, line 4, at the end of the legislation about the Creek Nation.

Then I will offer another amendment.

Mr. PALMER. May I interrupt the Senator from Arkansas to ask whether it is intended that that money shall be paid from the money of the Indians or from the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. To be paid from the money of the Indians. They have something like two and a half million dollars in the Treasury. They owe for the building of schoolhouses and for school purposes about $103,000, as the officers of the nation state. They also owe for outstanding awards of the nation $230,000, making a total of a debt which they have outstanding against the nation of about $335,000. This amendment proposes that the Secretary of the Interior may pay, out of their funds in the Treasury, $300,000 on this debt, after it has been carefully investigated by the Secretary of the Interior and been found regular in all respects.

Mr. BATE. I ask the Senator whether it is proposed that this money shall be paid out of the corpus of the fund of the Indians?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The proposition is to take it out of the money of the Cherokees held by the Treasury.

Mr. BATE. A fund upon which they receive interest?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. BATE. It is to be taken from the body of their fund?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, sir; it is to be taken to pay the debts they owe, and on which they are paying interest now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendments suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, as modified by the Senator from South Dakota, which he accepted.

The SECRETARY. On page 58, in line 17, after the word "law," it is proposed to insert:

And at such other places as shall be designated by the judges of said court.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. "By the appellate court," I would say, instead of "judges of said court." It ought to be done by the entire body of the appellate court, by an order made by the court.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert on page 58, line 17, after the word "law," the words:

And at such other places as shall be designated by the appellate court.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think that is in good shape.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Where does the Senator from Arkansas desire the last amendment he sent up to be inserted?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. At the end of the provision regarding the Chickasaw Nation. I do not remember the page.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

For fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Chickasaw Nation of Indians, namely: For arrears of interest, at 5 per cent per annum, from December 31, 1840, to June 30, 1889, on $184,143.09 of the trust fund of the Chickasaw Nation erroneously dropped from the books of the United States prior to December 31, 1840, and restored December 27, 1887, by the award of the Secretary of the Interior, under the fourth article of the treaty of June 22, 1852; and for arrears of interest, at 5 per cent per annum, from March 11, 1850, to March 3, 1890, on $56,021.49 of the trust fund of the Chickasaw Nation erroneously dropped from the books of the United States March 11, 1850, and restored December 27, 1887, by the award of the Secretary of the Interior, under the fourth article of the treaty of June 22, 1852, $558,520.54, to be paid to the treasurer of said nation upon requisition signed by the governor and national secretary of the Chickasaw Nation, and to be immediately available.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order against the amendment just read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has not yet offered the amendment, but states that he will offer it to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I simply present the amendment to be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I present the point of order that I desire to make on it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Iowa shall make the point of order on the amendment when it is offered. I think we can meet that proposition when it comes.

Now I offer another amendment, to which I will agree that the Senator may make the same sort of proposition, to come in at the end of the Chickasaw legislation.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the Chickasaw legislation in the bill it is proposed to insert:

That the disbursing officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, directed to pay, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the trustee or legal representatives of Eli Ayres the sum of $58,158.46: Provided, That such payment when made shall operate as a final settlement in full, as between the said trustee and legal representatives of said Eli Ayres, his or their heirs or assigns, and the United States, for any claim against the United States which said Ayres may have had during his lifetime by reason of the fact that he purchased, and there was conveyed to him, the right and title of certain Chickasaw Indians to 124,160 acres of land in the State of Mississippi, held by such Indians under the provisions of a treaty made by the United States with the Chickasaw Nation of Indians on the 24th day of May, 1834, and which said lands so purchased by said Ayres were appropriated and disposed of by the United States; the deeds by which said Indians conveyed said lands to said Ayres to be duly surrendered upon the payment to said trustee or legal representatives of the amount herein appropriated: And provided further, That when said deeds are so surrendered to the United States, and said payment so made to the trustee or legal representatives of said Eli Ayres as aforesaid, this act shall operate to forever quiet all such land titles in the State of Mississippi heretofore and now affected by reason of the appropriation and sale, or other disposition of the lands so purchased by said Ayres of said Indians, as herein set forth. The said amount of $58,158.46 is hereby made immediately available.

Mr. ALLISON. I give notice that I shall interpose a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now wish to go back to the amendment on page 48 objected to by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. He has examined the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the letter of the superintendent of Indian schools, and withdraws his objection to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. On what page?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is the committee amendment on page 48.

The Committee on Appropriations reported an amendment on page 48, after line 17, to insert the following:

For the purchase of the east half of section 16, township 107, range 48, Moody County, in the State of South Dakota, to be used as an industrial farm for said Flandreau school, at a price not to exceed $25 per acre, $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was disagreed to, and I move that the vote by which it was rejected be reconsidered. Then I will ask that the amendment may be reinstated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Dakota to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the amendment is agreed to, I desire simply to say that had my attention been called, as was not, to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, two gentlemen in whom I have the highest confidence, I probably should not have made the opposition to the amendment that I did.

In addition to that, the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] assures me that it is very necessary that the purchase shall be made, and that it is in the line of true economy. Hence I withdraw my opposition to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is an amendment on page 52 which it was agreed should go over until to-morrow, but I understand the Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 10, on page 52, it is proposed to insert:

For the purchase of not less than 100 acres of good farming land in the immediate vicinity of the Indian training school at Pierre, S. Dak., to be used as an industrial farm for said school, and to be, in his judgment, suited for such purpose, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like, at this time, to secure, if possible, an agreement to take up the pending bill to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine morning business, under the ten-minutes rule.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think that order ought to be made. I shall object to it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Without limiting debate, then, I ask unanimous consent that we may take up the bill to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine business.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall object to that request. We ought to have some time to-morrow morning to transact morning business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. After the routine morning business.

Mr. ALLEN. There is no objection to its being taken up after all of the routine morning business is transacted, but I shall strenuously object to the bill interfering with morning business, and I shall object to its being considered under any limitation as to debate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Do I understand it is agreed that the bill shall come up to-morrow immediately after the routine morning business?

Mr. ALLISON. Immediately after the morning business.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the present bill shall be taken up immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know about that. The Cuban joint resolution will be before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the joint resolution is the unfinished business, and will come up at the end of the morning hour.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. At the expiration of the two hours, would the Cuban joint resolution, by force of that fact, come before the Senate to be considered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At 1 o'clock.

Mr. WHITE. I believe I will be entitled to the floor at 1 o'clock. I mention this for fear the Senator from Nebraska may seek to take the floor upon the subject then.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will allow the Indian appropriation bill to be proceeded with to-morrow morning after the routine morning business is concluded.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not object to that.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me it is manifest that if we are to pass the appropriation bills at all we must proceed to consider them in season and out of season until they are disposed of. It has been disclosed to-night that there are a number of contested questions as to the pending bill, some of which the Senator from Nebraska himself has raised during the evening, involving amendments that will occupy a great deal of time to-morrow, and I hope we will agree that the appropriation bills shall be considered. It is absolutely certain that if they are not considered continuously from now on until disposed of they can not pass at the present session. I do not believe any Senator desires to have them defeated or postponed.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not objected to taking up the pending bill at the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow and considering it during the morning hour. I do object to any limitation upon debate on the bill, and shall object to that; and I shall object to its displacing the Cuban joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again state the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. WHITE. If the Chair will permit me for one moment, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska who has the floor, I will say that while I am perfectly willing, and in fact personally I prefer, to conclude the remarks which I commenced to make to-day, it appears to me that every member of the Senate must be cognizant of the fact that we are now proceeding within less than ten days of the expiration, not to say the death, of the present Congress. If the joint resolution regarding the Cuban matter passes the Senate and goes to the House, and passes the House and goes to the President, it will there be relegated to the limbo of forgotten things. It is not to be expected that the President will reverse the policy which he has himself clearly outlined and will sign the joint resolution; and it is not to be expected that if he is opposed to it he will veto it and again subject himself and his policy to the commentaries which he knows they will be subjected to here. Hence, if we are practical, if we are desirous of doing something, we will spend our time in an effort to pass bills which we may pass and which may become laws.

The Senator from Iowa has informed us with truth that we have barely time enough to pass the appropriation bills, devoting ourselves to them without considering anything else. If we are here for practical purposes, we will devote ourselves to appropriation bills. If we are here for the purpose of making a display, in the language of a gentleman whom I know my friend the Senator from Nebraska will love to quote, of an entirely innocuous character, we will go on with the consideration of the Cuban matter.

Mr. PALMER and Mr. CHANDLER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought I had the floor. I yielded to the Senator from California for just one moment.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was under a misapprehension, and will therefore recognize the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CHANDLER. Has the Senator from Nebraska the floor continuously?

Mr. ALLEN. Just a second. Let me state ten words, and I will give up the floor to anybody who wants it.

I do not desire to obstruct the passage of the appropriation bills. I want that distinctly understood. But I do not propose to be snapped off, or cut off, or quirked off, as to any meritorious amendment to this or any other bill. That is one thing I want to guard against, and it is one thing I propose to guard against, so far as my capacity will go.

I sympathize with the Senator from Iowa who has these bills in charge, and I desire to see him successful in getting every one of them through before Congress adjourns. I sympathize with the Cuban joint resolution, and the argument of the Senator from California finds no place whatever in my mind. We can not afford to neglect our duty or fail to discharge our duty because the distinguished gentleman at the White House may see fit to neglect his. Let us send the joint resolution to him and let us see what he will do with it, and let him be responsible.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

Mr. SQUIRE. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PALMER. The Senator from Washington asks me to yield the floor to him, and if I am entitled to it, I do so with great pleasure.

Mr. STEWART and Mr. SQUIRE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would rule that the Senator from Illinois can not farm out the floor. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. PALMER. Have I farmed it out already, Mr. President? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I simply wish to remark that a large majority of the Senators to-day voted, in view of all the circumstances—and they are Senators who do not desire to interfere with the appropriation bills—to take up the Cuban joint resolution. If there is anything that affects the character and standing of this Government, it is that it shall vindicate the principles upon which it was established; that it shall exercise the protection over struggling republics on this hemisphere which it assumes to exercise. We assume that we will protect them. We will not allow any foreign government to interfere. We say we will see justice done. This Government, by the Monroe doctrine, has said to the world that it will see justice done to the struggling republics on this hemisphere and that it will not allow any other government to interfere. We have assumed that responsibility.

Now, having assumed that responsibility and having said "hands off" to everybody else, we stand by and see the most aggravating outrages against humanity perpetrated on our borders, not only against the Cubans, but against our own citizens, and it is said that the Senate shall not speak out because the Executive has determined otherwise, and that the voice of the people shall be stifled; that there shall be no Americans in the Senate because there is none in the White House. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HAWLEY. I call attention to the disorder in the galleries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the occupants of the galleries that the rule of the Senate prohibits any demonstration of approval or disapproval, and if it is repeated the Chair will be compelled to have the galleries cleared.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to know what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the request for unanimous consent made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], which, when the Senator from Nevada yields the floor, will be submitted to the Senate by the Chair.

Mr. STEWART. I for one desire to have an opportunity to vote what I believe to be the American sentiment. I want to vote for the joint resolution which comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations and demand the release of an American citizen who is held contrary to law, contrary to the usages of war. I should like to vote for the release of all who are kept in dungeons and tortured and about to be killed by this barbarous power.

The United States is responsible for every outrage against the laws of humanity that occurs in Cuba, because we have assumed that nobody else shall act. Having assumed that, how dare we refuse to exercise the power we have undertaken to exercise and to keep all other hands off? It seems to me we have forgotten the Monroe doctrine. We have forgotten that we will allow nobody else to interfere. It is admitted by the Executive, by the documents here on file, by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and by the whole country that outrages are being committed in Cuba which demand the interference of civilized governments. If those outrages were committed elsewhere, if they were committed on the other side of the Atlantic, the monarchies of those countries would not permit them. Here we have assumed this jurisdiction, and then we say to the Spanish desperadoes, to the Spanish barbarians, "Murder; kill; do what you please, and there will be no expression here, because we can not expect a corresponding expression at the White House."

That is no excuse for us. I am glad the Committee on Foreign Relations has spoken at last. If the Senate refuses to respond to that sentiment, we will be held responsible. That was the opinion of the Senate when it voted by this large majority to-day to take up the joint resolution. I think my friend the Senator from California, who occupied so much time, is not in a position to lecture us and tell us to stop or the appropriation bills will fail.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. STEWART. We have not made them fail. We have not occupied the time. If the appropriation bills fail, they will fail because unnecessary time is occupied in opposing a sentiment dear to every American heart. Let us pass the joint resolution as it comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations without debate, and if we are Americans we will do it, and do it quickly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit to the Senate the request of the Senator from South Dakota, which is the only matter now before the Senate. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow the Indian appropriation bill shall be taken up for consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. PALMER. I rise to address the Senate on this question, if no other.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Let us get the consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. I object.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent to call up a bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. If I am entitled to the floor, I object to any other Senator addressing the Senate on any other question unless he is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from New Hampshire as entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I thought a motion to adjourn was made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I heard it made twice.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 1823. I have waited all the evening. I yielded once or twice when I had the floor out of courtesy to Senators, and I am almost persuaded to yield to the Senator from Illinois. The bill has been amended to the satisfaction of everybody who has any interest in it.

Mr. HILL. What is the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that it may be considered, so that it may pass the House.

Mr. CALL. What is the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a bill to increase the water supply of the city of Washington. I ask that it may be now considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is very important.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending that request, the Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw his motion until this bill can be acted upon.

Mr. ALDRICH. I withdraw the motion if the bill can be passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. It has been read through, and I do not think anybody will object to it.

Mr. HILL. In the interest of temperance, I hope the bill will be passed. [Laughter.]

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw the motion to adjourn, in order that I may be allowed a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CHANDLER. After my bill is passed, I will yield with great pleasure. It will take but a moment.

Mr. PALMER. I accept no terms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1823) to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has heretofore been read as in Committee of the Whole, and the committee amendments have all been agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIO SANGUILY.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. What becomes of my motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not.

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator from Rhode Island is entitled to the floor, no doubt he has a right to make the motion, and I will not oppose it; but I should like to address the Senate for five minutes, my particular purpose being to reply to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. President, there is a statesman in the White House—a bold, brave, patriotic, manly statesman—whose purpose it is to enforce the laws of the country and international law. The President has endeavored to maintain the strictest neutrality on the part of the United States in this unhappy controversy between Spain and her Cuban colony. I have listened in the Senate to these attacks, and I have regarded the recent Cuban exploitation as a mere tempest in a teapot, which ought not to stand in the way of the proper consideration of the appropriation bills and such other legislation as is incumbent upon the Congress of the United States.

With that statement, sir, I have consumed all the time I desire to occupy.

BUREAU OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS REPORT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, a communication from the Secretary of State covering the report of the Director of the Bureau of the American Republics for the year 1896.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 25, 1897.

BONDED WAREHOUSES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 6th instant, a report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue relative to the discontinuance of general bonded warehouses established under the provisions of the act of August 24, 1894; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE FOR ALLEGED POLITICAL REASONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 22d instant, information relative to the removal of certain employees in the Bureau of Animal Industry at South Omaha, Nebr.; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THURSTON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bladen, Nebr., and a petition of sundry citizens of Stuart, Nebr., praying for the enactment of legislation regulating fraternal beneficiary societies, orders, and associations; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CALL presented a memorial from the Seneca Nation of Indians, remonstrating against the proposed purchase by the Secretary of the Interior of the title or interest of the Ogden Land Company in and to lands embraced within the Allegany and Cattaraugus Indian Reservation, in the State of New York; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of the general assembly of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation increasing the salaries of letter carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
January Session, A. D. 1897.

Concerning an act of Congress relating to letter carriers.

Whereas on the 11th day of June, 1896, the Senate of the United States passed a bill known as S. 3058, to regulate the salaries of letter carriers, and which provides that in cities of 75,000 or more inhabitants they shall receive for the first year of service $800, and for the second year $900, for the third year

$1,000, and for the fourth year and thereafter $1,200, and that in cities of less than 75,000 inhabitants they shall receive $600 for the first year, $800 for the second year, and $1,000 for the third year of service and thereafter; and

Whereas a similar bill (H. R. 260) has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and in addition has received the approval of many State legislatures, city governments, boards of trade, and, without exception, the public press: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the senate and house of representatives of the State of Connecticut, recognizing the arduous and responsible duties of this branch of the public service, and the fact that for the past nineteen years it has been more than self-supporting, and that the increase in the gross receipts during the last fiscal year will more than cover the additional cost of this measure, do hereby request the members of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress from the State of Connecticut to use every proper means to secure the enactment of this measure into law.

Resolved, That the clerk of the senate and the clerk of the house be instructed to forward copies of this resolution to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from Connecticut in Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 17, 1897.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of South Manchester, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate gambling by telegraph, telephone, or otherwise; for the appointment of an impartial, nonpartisan industrial commission; to raise the age of consent to 18 years in the District of Columbia and the Territories, and also to further protect the first day of the week as a day of rest in the District of Columbia; which were ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SQUIRE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I renew the motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 26, 1897, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 25, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THE RECORD.

Mr. LACEY. I present a conference report on the bill S. 3328.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to correct the RECORD?

Mr. BARRETT. I rise to ask a question with that in view. I find on page 2300 of the RECORD the statement:

[During the reading of the bill, Mr. Bryan entered the Hall, and was loudly applauded by members on the Democratic side.]

I ask if that is not an improper thing to put in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a very improper thing to put in the RECORD. Is it there?

Mr. BARRETT. I desire to move it be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order it stricken out.

REPEAL OF TIMBER-CULTURE LAWS.

Mr. LACEY. I present a conference report on the bill S. 3328.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3328) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment inserting the word "only" in the nineteenth line of said bill.

That the Senate concur in the House amendment inserting after the word "in," in the twenty-first line, the words "North Dakota," and after the word "Dakota," in the same line, insert the words "and Nebraska."

JOHN F. LACEY,
WM. B. ELLIS,
THOS. C. McRAE,
Managers on the part of the House.

R. F. PETTIGREW,
T. H. CARTER,
J. H. BERRY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

The word "only" was inserted in the nineteenth line of the bill by the House without being considered by any committee of the House, and its retention would repeal the existing law, except in the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Nebraska, in relation to commutation of homestead entry after fourteen months' residence thereon.

The words "North Dakota and Nebraska" have been inserted in the twenty-first line of the bill, because the Sioux Indian Reservation extends into both the States named.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCEWAN, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 948) to remove charge of desertion against Jacob M. Hamburger;

A bill (H. R. 1984) to provide for the use and occupation of reservoir sites reserved; and

A bill (H. R. 9689) for the relief of Daniel E. De Clute.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1832) to define the rights of purchasers under mortgages authorized by an act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, concerning the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company; and

A bill (S. 3307) declaring the Potomac Flats a public park under the name of the Potomac Park.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9061) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows: That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6, 8, 13, and 15.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$35,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$65,000;" and strike out, in line 20, page 18 of the bill, the word "twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$130,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$110,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. W. WADSWORTH,
E. S. HENRY,
J. D. CLARDY,
Managers on the part of the House.

S. M. CULLOM,
M. S. QUAY,
WILKINSON CALL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

In explanation of this report your conferees beg to submit—

That amendments numbered 6, 13, 15, and 18 refer to the increases proposed by the Senate to the Division of Botany, to the Division of Biological Survey, to the Division of Publications, and a proposed renewal of the sugar investigation; to all of which your conferees refused to agree, and from which the Senate receded.

Amendments numbered 1, 3, 9, 11, 12, 14, 22, and 23 refer to slight increases proposed by the Senate to the Division of Chemistry, to the Bureau of Animal Industry, to the pomological investigation, to the agricultural experiment stations (with a view of ascertaining the agricultural resources of Alaska, with special reference to the desirability and feasibility of the establishment of an experiment station in that Territory), to the Department library, to the contingent expenses of the Department, and to the purchase of seeds; to all of which your conferees agreed.

The bill as passed by the House carried $3,155,702, which amount was increased by the Senate $62,200, making a total of $3,217,902. In conference, the Senate increase was reduced by $35,000, leaving a net increase of $27,200. The total of the bill as agreed to in conference is $3,182,902, being $72,630 less than the amount carried by the Agricultural appropriation act for the current fiscal year.

All the other amendments, namely, numbered 2, 4, 5, 7, 10, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33, are merely corrections of errors in printing, punctuation, and totals, and do not affect the general intent or purpose of the bill.

J. W. WADSWORTH,
E. S. HENRY,
J. D. CLARDY.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conference report be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WADSWORTH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the Army appropriation bill.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4 to the bill (H. R. 9638) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

J. A. T. HULL,
R. WAYNE PARKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

M. S. QUAY,
EUGENE HALE,
JO. C. S. BLACKBURN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The amendment on which disagreement is had relates to the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark. The House provision appropriated for hospitals except the one above referred to; the Senate amendment appropriated specifically for the above hospital. The House conferees proposed an amendment by which the Secretary of War could use in his discretion any part of the general hospital appropriation for the Army and Navy Hospital at Hot Springs, thus placing this hospital on the same basis as all other army hospitals. This was refused by the Senate conferees. After the repeated votes of the House we did not feel authorized to surrender the House contention and report the disagreement, leaving to the judgment of the House further action on the bill.

J. A. T. HULL.
R. WAYNE PARKER.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the committee of conference, as stated in the report, was unable to agree in regard to the Hot Springs Hospital. The House, by a specific vote, instructed its committee to insist on the position of the House, which was to leave out the appropriation for this hospital. We found in our conference with the Senate conferees that it was impossible for them—I will not say impossible, but at least that they did not feel authorized—to agree to any proposition which would not meet the approval of the Senators from Arkansas, and it did seem to the conferees on the part of the House that in a full and free conference of the two Houses the contention and the disagreement should be confined to the conferees representing the two independent Houses of Congress. It seems, however, that in this matter there are three legislative bodies, the House, the Senate, and the Senators from Arkansas; and if that is to be the rule of legislation whenever any extravagant matter is foisted upon an appropriation bill, it will be impossible to get away from it unless the Senator or Senators representing the State directly concerned shall rise above his or their own personal wishes and legislate for the good of the people at large.

Mr. TERRY. At that point may I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. TERRY. I would ask the gentleman if he might not add a fourth legislative body—the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs? And in that connection I would ask him if it is not a fact that all the members of the committee are in favor of this appropriation except the honorable chairman?

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas that that is not the fact at all.

Mr. TERRY. I have been so advised.

Mr. HULL. The committee is practically unanimous in favoring the doing away with that hospital at Hot Springs. I will say further to the gentleman from Arkansas that the Secretary of War, a member of his own party, after a full investigation of the question, reports that it costs the Government $38,000 a year to keep up that hospital, an average of four and a half dollars a day for every patient.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the conferees and the Committee on Military Affairs (whom the gentleman has brought in question) have felt that it is assuming a very grave responsibility to report back a disagreement in such a shape that a great appropriation for the Army of the United States shall fail. We would not surrender the position taken by the House, but feel like placing on the members of the House the responsibility of deciding. And we have brought the report back in this form, awaiting the further instructions of the House, without any intention on the part of the majority of the conferees to make any motion until the House decides what it desires shall be done.

The gentleman from New York, one of the conferees on the part of the House, while believing—I am certain I do not misrepresent him in this, although he can speak for himself—while believing that the hospital at Hot Springs should be done away with, does not believe that the Army appropriation bill should fail on account of the controversy over this small sum of $38,000. And I will say further that the entire amount, $38,000, is probably not chargeable to that hospital, because if this appropriation should fail, the Army surgeon detailed there and the hospital steward detailed there would probably be assigned to duties somewhere else and receive their salary just as they do now. But the contention on the part of the majority of the conferees on the part of the House is simply this, that the House in these matters of conference is not treated fairly by the Senate; that the House conferees ought to represent the sentiment of the House and not surrender always to the Senate. If the House itself wants to concede the contention of the Senate and continue an institution which is no longer of any benefit to the country, the conferees will not feel that they have been turned down by such action on the part of the House. The House, on full information, can take such action as seems best to each member. If, on the other hand, the House of Representatives should insist on its right in this matter and should prefer to let this bill die, the conferees will be perfectly satisfied with that conclusion.

I now yield to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, this is a rather important matter, not on account of the hospital at Hot Springs, but on account of the position in which the House finds itself in this conference. We have proposed, as stated in this report, that the general appropriations for hospitals for the Army (which is a lump sum) should be made applicable to hospitals at army posts or elsewhere. The result would be that the Secretary of War and the general in command of the Army could, as to this hospital, as well as to any other post belonging to the Army, send doctors or Army officers or in any other respect take charge of the management. The position which this particular hospital has occupied for the last eight years in our appropriation bills has been unique, the provision having been a direction to the Secretary of War to send doctors to a particular place. This provision was a "rider" in the beginning. The attempt is to put it in as a "rider" now. And the State of Arkansas holds up the Army supply wagon until its "rider" can get aboard and travel with it. Until this is accomplished, the State of Arkansas says the wagon shall go no farther.

Now, I do not think that is legislation. I think it requires two Houses to make an appropriation. We have not objected to the whole matter going before the Secretary of War—not the present Secretary of War, who may be thought to be prejudiced on this subject, but before the new Secretary of War—to be looked into and decided as he pleases. We do object, in the name of the House, that in this marriage relation between the two great bodies constituting the legislative authority of the Government, the wife should say to the husband, "I will not keep house unless my boy has his Noah's ark this year." We believe it takes two to make an appropriation; that when the House sends to the Senate its suggestions with reference to appropriations, that body may disapprove them. It may send suggestions that we may disapprove. We then agree on certain items, but when we have both agreed on these items as necessary for the Army, we do not think it is legislation for the other party to say, "Unless you pass this particular petty appropriation, we will not pass the great Army bill; we will hold it up."

Now, I do not believe the controversy will go to that extent. That effort has not been made. I do not mean to say that the coordinate legislative authority of this Government has threatened this House in that way. But practically it amounts to the same thing. We are at the end of the session, and unless $38,000 or $50,000—I have forgotten what the exact sum is—goes to a particular hospital the Army bill sleeps.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: Is it a fact that this bill will fail unless the House conferees yield to the Senate?

Mr. PARKER. I do not believe it. I do not believe that a legislative body of the Government would say that because we do not agree to a special "rider" in favor of a certain hospital, the Army bill shall fail.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then it is your opinion, is it, that if the House conferees insist on the elimination of this Senate amendment from the bill, the bill will be agreed to by the Senate and will pass?

Mr. PARKER. It is certainly my judgment. It is my judgment simply because I do not think it has ever been tried by this House.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Do the other conferees entertain the same opinion that you do on this subject?

Mr. PARKER. You will have to ask the chairman himself on that subject.

Mr. TERRY. I should like to ask the gentleman, on that point, if certain of the House conferees have not threatened that if they do not get their way about this, the bill will be defeated?

Mr. PARKER. Oh, no; we have never made any such threats.

Mr. TERRY. Has it not been so stated?

Mr. PARKER. It never has been, to my knowledge.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. In the time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], I should like to put the same question to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HULL], so that the House may know.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, that is a mere matter of judgment. I can only say that the conferees on the part of the Senate have said that they would not consent, and the Senate would not consent, to allow us to drop the hospital at Hot Springs.

I do not care to go into all the details of our conference, but I should like to say that, in my judgment, the Senate will not agree to the Army bill with this proposition stricken out, unless the Senators from Arkansas themselves consent to its passing the Senate.

That is my best judgment on the subject, and if my friend will yield just a minute, I want to say in answer to what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] has said, that there has been no threat on the part of the conferees of the House. There has been this statement: That we did not believe that the House would consent; but there has never been any proposition that we were not willing to refer it to the House without prejudice, and let the House have a square vote on this question; but we have not been able to get that much from the Senate conferees. If we could have done that, we should have been satisfied. We have never been able to get the Senate to report the proposition that we made, or to insert in these amendments the proposition referred to by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] to put the whole matter, by the specific terms of the bill, under the control of the Secretary of War, and let him use his discretion as to this hospital, as he does about every other hospital in the United States, and let the Senate vote on that proposition. We could get no concession.

Mr. TERRY. On that, since the gentleman has stated——

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. TERRY. I want to ask you a question.

Mr. PARKER. I should be glad to finish my statement. There will be plenty of opportunity to ask questions.

Mr. TERRY. I wanted to ask it in that connection.

Mr. PARKER. I only want to say one word more. Under the Constitution this House has a right to originate revenue bills. It has always been understood that that term included appropriation bills. This present practice would make the House simply submit estimates of those bills. The House would propose and the Senate dispose.

It is hard to say to what extent the House will be asked to enact what it does not want for fear of the failure of a good measure. Only last session it sent over to the Senate a bill to raise revenue for this country, and got back the statement that it must give free coinage or there would be no bill for revenue. It then sent over a bill to reduce the interest on the public debt, and got back the answer that there must be free coinage or there would be no reduction of interest. I am not discussing the merits of these matters, I am only speaking of the position and practice between the House and the Senate. We now send to the Senate an Army bill, carrying appropriations needed for the support of the Army, and it is said that, unless the House is made to do what it does not want to do, that is, agree to a certain particular hospital, the bill will fail.

I yield back the balance of my time to the chairman.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I move that the House recede from its disagreement with the Senate amendment and concur in the same.

I do not want, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the merits or demerits of the hospital at the Hot Springs of Arkansas. That has already been done at great length while the Army bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole. The point made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is not that this appropriation is extravagant, for it has been variously estimated that if the hospital is discontinued there will only be a net saving of from $3,700 to $6,000 annually; but I take it that it is because in some way, a way which I confess is not clear to me, the House, by concurring in this amendment, will suffer some loss of dignity, some loss of prestige. Now, as a matter of fact, in the various conferences that we have had the Senate has yielded on some amendments and we have yielded on others. Perhaps the amendments yielded have not involved the grave question that this amendment is said to involve—the question of the constitutional rights and powers of the House; but, nevertheless, both the Senate and House have yielded.

This appropriation for the hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., is one that has been carried on the Army appropriation bill year after year ever since the hospital was built. Possibly technically it has not been a change of existing law; but certainly it has amounted to that. When the House struck out the appropriation for this purpose it made an innovation. The Senate does not ask any new legislation. It merely asks to restore the appropriation that has been made every year for a number of years past. And, moreover, it has been the almost invariable custom that where one House proposes new legislation, and the other House declines to agree to such new legislation, the House proposing the innovation yields. We are confronted with one of two propositions; for I agree with my friend the chairman of the committee that if we do not agree to this amendment the bill will fail. We are confronted with one of two propositions—either that we will preserve our sacred dignity inviolate or that the bill will fail; and we will then be subjecting the Army to the risk and the House to the inconvenience of having the whole question up again in the extra session, and being confronted again with this very proposition of the dignity of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask the gentleman is it a question of dignity or right. Should this amendment be in this bill?

Mr. McCLELLAN. In view of what the Surgeon-General has said in his report about this hospital, I think it should. I have changed my mind, I am very frank to say. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, if we are willing to yield and concur in the Senate amendment, there is no question but that the bill will pass. That is the only point in dispute; and much as I dislike to disagree with my colleagues on the conference committee, I was unwilling to sign the report and in the last five days of the session make it absolutely certain that the bill would fail. I have felt that there was no other course for me to follow but to take the responsibility of stating the facts in the case as I understand them and of submitting this motion to the House and urging that it be agreed to. I reserve the balance of my time, and yield to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. GRIFFIN] such time as he may desire.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Such time as the gentleman may desire.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who are so sensitive with reference to the respective rights of the two legislative bodies concerning matters which necessarily come before them for concurrent action as some of the other members on the Committee on Military Affairs. I am willing to concede the fact that the conferees on the part of the House have diligently and in good faith exhausted all their powers, their persuasion, and their ingenuity to secure an agreement with the conferees of the Senate; but having done so, and having failed, I believe it is the duty of the conferees on the part of the House and of this House to agree to the Senate amendment. If it were a change that the Senate was effecting from the usual course of things, I would view it differently; but we are the body who are asking for the change, not the Senate. Ever since 1883 this hospital at Hot Springs has been maintained. It is true that one of the officers of this Government has expressed the idea that it has not quite met the expectations, and that it may not meet the expectations, of those who were instrumental in its construction and opening. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, to my mind this is not the time when we should curtail the military establishment of this Government. There may not be, and yet it seems to me that I can see in the distance a speck that might be an indication of trouble with some foreign nation. With that in view, and laying aside the personal pride of this House and of the members of the committee of conference of this House, casting that aside, I believe it to be the duty of this House to accept the Senate amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. What amount of dollars and cents is involved in this difference between the two bodies.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is said $38,000. I do not verify that.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The net saving to the Government has been estimated at from $3,700 to $6,000.

Mr. SAYERS. So that even if the Senate should recede from the amendment there would only be a saving of $3,500 to $4,000.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Probably $6,000 net.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. I would like to fully explain this. The Secretary of War gave a detailed statement in an explanation of the House bill and he put it at $38,000. Now, then, there may be a saving of more or less of part of that made by the army surgeons being detailed to other places. The contention of the Secretary of War is that you may be able to reduce the force in the Medical Department, if there is any other place for them to work; so that he puts the saving at $38,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not familiar with the merits of this controversy. I do not know whether the Senate or the House conferees are right; but there is an unbroken rule prevailing between the two Houses which has come to be regarded as unwritten law. It ought to settle this question. I understand this to be the rule: That where one body proposes any new legislation, if the other body persists in antagonizing it the body proposing the new legislation must in the end recede. Now, I do not know whether this is new legislation or not, but I have merely stated the rule as I understand it.

Mr. SAYERS. I would say to the gentleman that that ought to be the rule and generally is the rule, but it is not by any means an unbroken one.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is the very point I am contending for. We introduced this proposition into the Army bill as new legislation. The Senate say, and they have a right to say, that they will not accept that change, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr.

DOCKERY], who is largely experienced in the methods by which legislation is accomplished, tells us that under the custom it is our duty ultimately to recede in this case, or, rather, to accept the Senate amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know anything about this controversy. I was speaking generally.

Mr. GRIFFIN. But you said that the body which had proposed new legislation to which objection was made by the other branch of Congress ought in the end to recede; that that was the custom.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think that is the rule which usually obtains as between parliamentary bodies.

Mr. LOUD. I would suggest, however, that that rule does not apply to the Senate. They always insist. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe when we are conducting a discussion in this House in saying anything which tends to array the Senate against the House, or the House against the Senate. Furthermore, I do not believe it is good policy on the part of this House to question the methods of the Senate in determining what they will or will not do. If Senatorial courtesy is so far respected in that body that the Senators from the State of Arkansas may say to the Senate, or to the conferees, that a bill shall not pass unless a certain proposition shall be retained in it, it is not for us to question that. That is one of the Senate's own methods, one of its own customs, with which we have nothing to do. This appears to me, Mr. Speaker, to be treated by some gentlemen as wholly a question of pride, and in my opinion such a consideration ought not to have any place in this controversy. The Senate has the undoubted right to say that it will not pass a measure unless a certain proposition shall be included in the measure. Even on bills for raising revenue, the right to originate which rests exclusively in this House—that exclusive right of origination on our part does not debar the Senate from proposing changes or amendments in such measures. That right is explicitly guaranteed by a provision of the Federal Constitution, and why, on an occasion of this kind, should we be so sensitive about a matter for which we are alone responsible in the first instance, when the Senate, in the exercise of its right, says that it will not accept this bill unless such a provision is contained in it?

Mr. Speaker, this Hot Springs Hospital, although singled out by name in the bill, is not, as the gentleman from Iowa would have the House infer, made the subject of a special appropriation. The bill names this hospital and mentions others generally, but when it comes to fixing the appropriation it is found to be made in a gross sum.

Mr. LITTLE. I will ask the gentleman whether it has not been the uniform custom to mention this hospital in the appropriation bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I understand that it has been the custom for several years.

Another point, Mr. Speaker. The Surgeon-General of the Army, who is supposed to be closer to this institution and to understand more about its advantages than perhaps the Secretary of War himself, speaks of it in his report with much favor. Now, I would rather accept the testimony of the Surgeon-General as to whether this hospital is a desirable institution or not than the testimony of an officer of the Government who does not come in such direct contact or association with institutions of this kind, and, under all the circumstances, I believe that this House would maintain its honor and its proper pride in a much more becoming manner by accepting the motion of my friend from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and by receding from the position that it took originally. I yield back to the gentleman from New York the remainder of the time.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I confess that I am somewhat surprised at the position taken by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin, not on the proposition to recede, but on the general argument. I concede that the Senate has a right to reject any proposition that may be sent to it by the House, but if I were making the statement I would not limit that right to the Senate. It seems to me that while my friend was contending for the rights of the Senate in that respect he might have very gracefully added that the House has the same right if, in its judgment, it chooses to exercise it, to even refuse its assent to any proposition in the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is well understood.

Mr. HULL. So is the right of the Senate well understood; yet I understood my friend to make his argument altogether upon the right of the Senate.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The right of the House was stated before I rose to address the Chair.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the two Houses ought to stand upon a plane of equality. Now, I want to very briefly put before this body the position of the majority of the House conferees as I understand it, and if I misstate it my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] will correct me. We are not contending that the House has not the right to recede and agree to the Senate amendment; but we are contending that, representing the dignity and power of the House of Representatives in this conference, we were not at liberty, after the three votes of the House upon this question, to surrender the position which the House had taken and hand this body over to the Senate without power to assert its own dignity, its own rights. If the House, in this matter, shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the conferees on the part of the House will still be fully satisfied with the position they have taken, and will feel that they have faithfully guarded the rights of the House in the matter up to this point.

Now, let me refer a moment to a point raised by my friend from Missouri. This is an anomalous proposition—to designate specifically by name a particular hospital in an appropriation bill—doing away with the discretionary power of the Secretary of War as applied to all other hospitals. It has been done heretofore only in the case of this hospital at Hot Springs.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. I will in a minute. If we are to concede in this case the right of the Senate to stop all appropriations for the Army, unless we agree to this particular matter, then we shall be met by this same method of proceeding hereafter.

The proposition in this case is different from a mere question involving new legislation, because we offered to put into this bill the words "at army posts and other places," so as to include all hospitals. Special provisions of this kind on appropriation bills should not be considered permanent law. Our contention was that in an appropriation bill we ought not to single out a particular hospital and by name insist that the Secretary of War must use a part of this appropriation for that particular hospital. I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Is it not a fact that it has been the uniform custom in our Army appropriation bills to mention specifically this hospital at Hot Springs; and is not the reason of it that this is a general hospital—an army and navy hospital? I ask the gentleman whether the naming of the hospital by the Senate in this amendment is not simply in keeping with the uniform custom on these bills?

Mr. HULL. I have stated that such has been the rule ever since this hospital was established.

Mr. LITTLE. So it is not a change.

Mr. HULL. But I think the rule is a bad one, and the sooner it is broken the better; and I do not believe such a provision on the bill of last year should bind us this year.

With regard to the suggestion that this hospital is unique, and that unless it be named specifically the Secretary of War can not use any part of this fund for its support, I wish to say to gentlemen of the House that there is nothing in such a contention. The whole force of the suggestion would be obviated by putting in the words we have proposed. The effect of a provision in that form would be that the money appropriated could be used in accordance with the discretion of the Secretary of War for this hospital on the same basis as all other hospitals.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not advised as to the contention in this case; and the gentleman will allow me to ask whether the proposition now in issue is a new item of legislation?

Mr. HULL. The proposition in issue is to this extent a new item—that we propose to leave out of the appropriation bill words that have heretofore been in it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Which body originated the new legislation?

Mr. HULL. We did, if it can be called new legislation.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Have the conferees on the part of the House any recommendation to make to the House in relation to this matter?

Mr. HULL. That is a very hard question. Our object is to put the House in possession of all the facts in the case; and the question whether this bill shall fail or not will be decided by each individual member of the House for himself.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the committee of conference has any recommendation to make to the House, I propose to vote in favor of that. If not, then this is an independent proposition for the House to deal with.

Mr. HULL. That is exactly what I have been trying to make the House understand. I want it to feel that it is an independent proposition. While in my opinion there are some members of the Senate who will do what they can to pass the bill in accordance with the House contention, I am absolutely satisfied that the bill will fail unless we agree to the contention of the Senate. The question now for each member of the House to determine is whether as an individual member he is willing to contend for the position of the House to the extent of letting the Army bill fail if that position be not assented to.

Mr. HYDE. Is it contemplated in any quarter to abolish this hospital? Is that question involved in the conference report?

Mr. HULL. Under the amendment proposed by the House it was intended to close the hospital at Hot Springs. In the amendment proposed by the Senate it was made obligatory that the Hot Springs Hospital should be kept up. In the proposition of the House conferees it was proposed to leave the whole matter with the Secretary of War. I think that answers the gentleman's question.

But the point which I want to impress upon the House is simply this: That each member is as competent to determine whether a great appropriation bill should fail as are the members of the committee of conference on the part of the House. What we desire is that each member shall vote as he pleases, with the understanding that we leave with the House itself the question whether the position of the House shall be surrendered or shall not be. We were not willing, as conferees, to submit to the demands of the Senate. The House can do as it pleases.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Does any gentleman desire to continue this discussion? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. NORTHWAY. I should like to say a word or two.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORTHWAY. While I have once voted to reduce this appropriation, yet I look at the question in this way: If a bill were introduced here to repeal the whole law pertaining to the hospital at Hot Springs, no one would contend that the Senate would not have a right to pass upon that measure, and if they declined to assent to it, no one could stand here and say that they were not exercising their constitutional right. Now, can we indirectly undertake to repeal a law by reducing an appropriation, and ask that the Senate shall be bound by that? I submit not.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MCCLELLAN that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the same, the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MCCLELLAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, by unanimous consent, submitted the views of the minority on the bill H. R. 10294, to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act and other acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and to provide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned; which were ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOW and Mr. MILLER of Kansas addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the regular order, which is the call of committees.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.

SUPREME COURT OF OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the bill (H. R. 3278) to amend section 1 of an act approved December 1, 1893, entitled "An act to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of Oklahoma, and for other purposes," approved December 21, 1893, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma shall consist of a chief justice and four associate justices, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum, and a majority of the judges sitting must concur to render an opinion reversing a judgment or other determination of the district court."

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will ask the Clerk to read the report.

The report (by Mr. BAILEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration House bill 3278, and report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask for a vote.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Is the bill unanimously reported?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am also directed to call up the bill (H. R. 4808) to increase the efficiency of the postal service. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURTON].

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person duly appointed as an inspector of the Post-Office establishment of the United States by the Postmaster-General shall have, in each State, the same powers in executing the laws governing the postal service of the United States as the marshals and their deputies and the sheriffs and their deputies in such State may have, by law, in executing the laws thereof.

SEC. 2. That it shall be lawful for any inspector of the Post-Office establishment of the United States to arrest, or, in case of escape or any attempt to escape, to pursue and arrest, any person found violating any act of Congress relating to the postal service, or for crimes against postal laws, and to bring said person or persons when so arrested before the nearest magistrate having jurisdiction in such cases, to be dealt with as the law directs.

SEC. 3. That every inspector of the Post-Office establishment of the United States authorized to make arrests by this title shall, at the time of executing any of the powers conferred upon him, make known, upon being questioned, his character as an inspector, and shall have authority to demand of any person, present or near at hand, to assist him in making any arrest authorized by this title, where such assistance may be deemed necessary; and if such person shall, without reasonable excuse, neglect or refuse so to assist, upon proper demand, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by a fine of not more than $200 nor less than $5.

SEC. 4. That every person who forcibly assaults, resists, opposes, prevents, impedes, or interferes, with any inspector of the Post-Office Department, or any person assisting him, in the execution of his powers and duties under this title shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined not less than $100 nor more than $2,000, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year, or both, for each offense.

The Committee on the Judiciary recommended an amendment striking out sections 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. After those sections are stricken out, how will the bill read?

The Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended, as follows:

That any person duly appointed as an inspector of the post-office establishment of the United States by the Postmaster-General shall have, in each State, the same powers in executing the laws governing the postal service of the United States as the marshals and their deputies and the sheriffs and their deputies in such State may have, by law, in executing the laws thereof.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I should like to have the report read.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. This is a very important change of the law, and I should like to have some explanation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let the report be read, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURTON] can make a statement.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I think the report will explain it. I shall be glad to answer any questions that may be asked.

The report (by Mr. BURTON of Missouri) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4808) to increase the efficiency of the postal service, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

That sections 2, 3, and 4 be stricken out, and that the bill as so amended do pass.

There are many violators of the laws governing the postal service who escape prosecution because of the inability of the inspectors of the Post-Office establishment to procure their arrests. Under the present law the inspectors are not authorized to arrest offenders, but are compelled to procure warrants and the service of United States marshals or their deputies. In many instances it is absolutely necessary that the offenders should be arrested immediately upon discovery; otherwise they make their escape. The bill as recommended confers upon the inspectors the same powers of arrest as are now possessed by United States marshals and their deputies and the sheriffs and their deputies in the several States.

This will enable the inspectors to arrest without warrant upon reasonable suspicion justified by the facts and circumstances surrounding the case, but will not relieve them from liability for arrests made without reasonable care. The efficiency of the postal service will be greatly promoted by the passage of the bill as recommended.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I should like to ask if this bill has been recommended by the Post-Office Department?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. It has.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Has it been submitted to the Attorney-General or the Department of Justice?

Mr. LOUD. Let me say to the gentleman that this bill was drawn by the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, and has been earnestly urged for a number of years. The bill, in the shape in which it was introduced, was drawn by the Assistant Attorney-General.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It is a radical departure——

Mr. MILES. And I will say, with the permission of my friend, that some matters which seemed to the Judiciary Committee to be objectionable were stricken out, and the bill is really more conservative than it was when introduced into the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. On that subject I should like to ask my friend——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has the floor.

Mr. MCMILLIN. After the gentleman from Illinois has concluded, I will ask my question.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I will suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that this is a radical departure from established law that has been in force in this country since the foundation of the Government. The selection of these post-office inspectors has heretofore been made for other purposes than the one designed by this bill. In selecting a marshal or a sheriff we look for different qualities than we do in a man who is to act purely as a post-office inspector.

Post-office inspectors are now under the civil service. These men have a life tenure. They have been put in that position without any reference at all to the additional duties that will be imposed upon them if this bill shall become a law, and it seems to me that we ought to be a little careful in making such a radical change as is here proposed. I should certainly want my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURTON] to give some more reasons than are stated in the report of the committee why Congress should make this change. Now, I do know from my observation in a number of cases that if in those cases this authority had been allowed to a post-office inspector, great trouble would have come to innocent men. They are not men of that broad discretion and conservative temperament that ought to be trusted with such power and authority as are granted in the bill itself.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. In answer to my friend from Illinois, I think it can be truthfully said that the post-office inspector as a rule is on a parity with the sheriff or deputy sheriff, respectively, in the several States. I do not apprehend that there has been any disposition on the part of the Post-Office Department to appoint as inspectors men who are not qualified, or to appoint them for any other purpose than to secure a proper enforcement of the postal laws. Now, then, let it be understood that there are many violations of the postal laws wherein the violators not only escape prosecution, but arrest, because of inability of inspectors to arrest. It is only necessary to call my friend's attention to that infant and growing industry, "green goods." Frequently the post-office inspector runs down and ascertains the party who does the "buncoing" in connection with that industry, and then, before he can secure from a commissioner of the United States a warrant for his arrest, the party makes his escape.

In order that the House may clearly understand what power is conferred by this bill, let us for a moment contemplate what are the powers of arrest. Any citizen has the right to arrest anyone who has committed a felony, either with or without a warrant; but if a private individual arrest one without a warrant, and he be sued for false imprisonment, then, in order to protect himself from money liability, he must prove not only that a felony has been committed, but that the particular party whom he arrested committed that felony. Officers are authorized to arrest without warrant, upon suspicion, provided that suspicion is justified by the facts and circumstances surrounding the case. Wherefore, if a United States marshal or a deputy marshal, or a sheriff or a deputy sheriff, without a warrant, arrest one for the alleged commission of an offense, and it appears on investigation that he had reasonable cause to believe that a crime had been committed, and the party whom he had arrested committed that crime, then, although he may have been mistaken, he can not be mulcted in damages. This bill merely proposes to confer upon an inspector of the Post-Office Department the right, whenever the circumstances or the facts in a case will justify him, to make an arrest. If he makes an arrest when the facts and circumstances do not justify it, then, of course, he is liable to be mulcted in damages. In other words, this bill confers upon the inspectors of the Post-Office Department just the same authority and power that is now conferred under the internal-revenue act upon officers who are called upon to enforce the provisions of that law. This bill came before the Committee on the Judiciary. We were of the opinion that the second and third sections of the bill, which confer special powers upon these inspectors, ought not to be enacted, but we did believe——

Mr. MILES. Those were all stricken out.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Those were all stricken out. But we did believe that it would be quite in harmony with our system of government, so far as powers are conferred upon officers, and in the interest of justice, of law, of order, and of prompt capture and punishment of those who from day to day are violating the postal laws, that these inspectors should have conferred upon them the powers that are now conferred by law upon sheriffs, deputy sheriffs, United States marshals and deputy United States marshals, and internal-revenue inspectors.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit a question at that point, if it does not interrupt him?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Marshals of the United States have jurisdiction given to them by the laws of the United States, and that is confined to the laws of the United States; but under the peculiar wording of this statute you give these officers not only the jurisdiction now given to the marshals under the law of the United States, but go beyond that, and give the constabulary authority that applies to the State where the offense occurs. It strikes me in some cases you may give these officers jurisdiction beyond that which the marshal has by reason of the fact that you clothe them with double authority.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I think my friend has not correctly read the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. This is the paragraph to which I call attention, and maybe in the haste of debate I have not given it the proper consideration. They—

Shall have in each State the same powers in executing the laws governing the postal service of the United States as the marshals and their deputies and the sheriffs and their deputies in such State may have, by law, in executing the laws thereof.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. My friend will see that the powers of these inspectors are limited in these lines to the enforcement of the postal laws—none other.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken about that. That says that he shall have the same powers of arrest that the State gives to the sheriff and the deputy sheriff.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Oh, no; "That any person duly appointed as an inspector of the Post-Office establishment of the United States by the Postmaster-General shall have in each State the same powers in executing the laws governing the postal service of the United States as the marshals and their deputies and the sheriffs and their deputies in such State may have, by law, in executing the laws thereof."

Mr. McMILLIN. The point I was making to my friend was that whereas the constables and sheriffs of one State may have one authority, like officers in another State may have another authority; so that you may be giving these inspectors greater authority in one State than they will have in another, instead of making their authority uniform.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I think not. I think the general power of arrest, either under warrant or without it, is substantially the same in every State in the Union.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have had to take the bill as it struck me in the hurry of debate, and I may not have caught its true import.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Let me ask the gentleman from Missouri this question: If one of these officers should arrest a man without just cause, would he be liable the same as a sheriff or deputy would be liable?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Exactly so. When he arrests any person arbitrarily, without reason or excuse, for a violation of the postal laws, he can not justify himself by saying "I am a post-office inspector, and therefore I am at liberty to do this thing without being called to account." He must justify every arrest he makes, if it be called in question, by showing that he had reasonable ground for making the arrest.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, and particularly to say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], that under the former administration of the Department of Justice this law was cordially approved by that Department, and they would have conferred powers even more extensive than we propose in this bill. The officers of the Department of Justice under the present Administration also cordially approve of this proposed law. It can work no harm, and it will work a great deal of good. The evil sought to be reached is principally this: The inspectors go out through the country and they find that crimes are being committed, violations of the postal laws and regulations. Most of those crimes are committed by professionals, men who generally are not known in the communities where the offenses are committed. The inspectors get upon the track of these criminals and chase them down, and finally catch them red-handed at some post-office, engaged in the commission of a crime against the postal laws. Remember, these criminals are generally unknown in the communities where they operate. In such a case the inspector, being without power to arrest, is compelled, under the existing law, to go to some officer of the law and make a complaint and swear out a warrant before he can arrest the offender, and in the meantime, while he is doing that, the offender discovers that he is being followed and is about to be arrested, so he disappears, runs away, and the criminal law is absolutely defeated for want of this power of arrest in the inspectors.

Mr. SAYERS. If the general rule of law which applies to the arrest of persons charged with offenses is to be broken in this instance, why should it exist at all?

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. It is not broken in this instance.

Mr. SAYERS. It is broken when you propose to allow these men to make arrests without an affidavit.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I would answer my friend from Texas by saying that it is not proposed to break the general rule of law and authorize anybody and everybody to make arrests. The proposition is to confer that power upon officers who have been particularly designated for this special work and whose work is incomplete because of the want of the power to arrest.

Mr. SAYERS. Why should not the same principle apply to every executive officer, every marshal and every deputy marshal?

Mr. RAY. This is not breaking the ordinary rule at all. If a deputy marshal or a marshal of the United States comes upon a man engaged in the commission of a crime, he has a right, under the existing law, to arrest him. In the State of New York and in most of the States of the Union, every officer, sheriff or deputy sheriff, constable or marshal, may arrest a man without a warrant when he finds him in the commission of a crime.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, when he finds him in the very act.

Mr. RAY. In the very act.

Mr. MILES. The officer always makes the arrest at his peril, and he does so under this bill.

Mr. RAY. Certainly. In many of the States of the Union even a private citizen may arrest an offender without a warrant.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. He may; but he takes the risk.

Mr. RAY. Now, in this case is there any good reason, in the interest of justice, why these inspectors, who are responsible to the community and to the Government, who are good men, selected because of their wisdom and discretion, should not have power to arrest offenders against the postal laws of the United States when they find those offenders engaged in the commission of some crime? This power can not be abused, while it ought to, and it must, result in great good. The Committee on the Judiciary, after a full investigation, were unanimous in favor of the bill.

Mr. TERRY. Not unanimous; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was opposed to it, and am still opposed to it.

Mr. RAY. I am sorry to hear that. I did not know that the gentleman had opposed it, and I thought the committee were unanimous, and I can still say that they were substantially unanimous in recommending the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make one or two suggestions in opposition to the passage of this bill in its present form. I think there is a wide difference between clothing one of these post-office inspectors with the powers of a United States marshal or a sheriff in one of the States, and clothing with such authority a person specially qualified for the performance of such duties by appointment in the regular way. These post-office inspectors become detectives, and a parallel to the action here proposed would be to clothe a Pinkerton detective with the authority of a marshal or a sheriff when searching out crime. We know, Mr. Speaker, what a strong protest has gone up in this country from the labor organizations because in a few instances these private detectives have been granted by local authorities the power of deputy sheriffs. It has been claimed, whether truthfully or not, that such persons have exceeded their authority—have deprived honest men of their liberty when it would never have been done had the exercise of the authority in question been in the hands of a person other than a detective. That is one of the reasons why I think this House should pause before it clothes these detectives of the postal service with this authority.

The next objection to the bill to which I wish to call the attention of gentlemen in charge of it is this: The gentleman says that if a man is unlawfully arrested, he has his action against the post-office inspector the same as he would have against the marshal or the sheriff. But I observe, Mr. Speaker, that the bill embraces no provision requiring bondsmen. A United States marshal is required to give a bond; a sheriff in any of the States is required to give a bond; but there is no provision of that kind with reference to these inspectors.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Does my friend assume that a marshal is liable on his bond for an unlawful act of his deputy—an unlawful arrest?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Well, I differ with my friend on the proposition of law.

Mr. RAY. My friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] does not claim that the sureties on a sheriff's or a marshal's bond are liable in case he makes a mistake?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I undertake to say that if an action would lie against the principal without a bond, then, in my State, if the deputy makes a false arrest acting under the color of his official authority, his principal, the sheriff, is liable and his bondsmen are liable upon an action brought against the sheriff.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What does a marshal or a sheriff give bonds for?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not against murder.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Against breach of the peace?

Mr. RAY. Against murder and against assault and battery——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. A sheriff gives bond for the faithful discharge of his duty and that of his deputies, and his bondsmen are liable for his acts under color of his office.

Now, allow me to state my proposition a little further. These gentlemen seem to take exception to it.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Not all of us; I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Under the law as it exists to-day the bondsmen of these officers of the courts are liable for their illegal acts. If a sheriff arrests unlawfully a constituent of mine, that constituent has a right to sue the bondsmen. But in this bill there is no such provision. And the remedy which is proposed here is a remedy without any merit whatever, because these post-office inspectors are in general men without any property. There is no method of garnisheeing the salaries paid by the Government of the United States. If, therefore, a post-office inspector is clothed with the authority proposed in this bill, there is absolutely no remedy for a man who may be unlawfully arrested by such an official. So it seems to me that if gentlemen here desire to give to post-office inspectors authority which they do not now possess, the bill ought to be elaborated so as to make these men liable on good and sufficient bonds for their unlawful acts. That the bill as now framed does not do this is one of my objections to its passage in its present form.

Mr. MILES. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] to maintain that the bondsmen of a sheriff or marshal or deputy marshal are responsible for any illegal acts of that officer, or does the gentleman mean to say that they are responsible only for acts necessarily incident to the discharge of the duties of the office?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I mean to say that as the bond runs, the bondsmen are liable to pay whatever judgment is rendered against the officer.

Mr. MILES. Of course; but can judgment be rendered for any unlawful act that he may commit?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I undertake to say that it can in Illinois, if done under color of his office; and such ought to be the law everywhere.

Mr. MILES. It certainly would not be good law anywhere else than in Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, I understand the law is the same in Ohio and most of the States.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], and then I wish to reserve the balance of my time. I trust the Chair will recognize, at the end of five minutes, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, some of these gentlemen have taken issue with me as to the law in this case as I have stated it. I said that any man who would read the statutes would not make the statement that some of these gentlemen have made, and I was contradicted by some of my wise friends. Now, the Congress of the United States has passed a law on this subject, and I desire to read it. Perhaps I do not understand it, but I think I do. Section 786 of the Revised Statutes of the United States reads as follows:

SEC. 786. Every marshal, before he enters on the duties of his office, shall give bond before the district judge of the district, jointly and severally, with two good and sufficient sureties, inhabitants and freeholders of such district, to be approved by said judge, in the sum of $20,000, for the faithful performance of said duties by himself and his deputies. Said bond shall be filed and recorded in the office of the clerk of the district court or circuit court sitting within the district, and copies thereof, certified by the clerk, under the seal of the said court, shall be competent evidence in any court of justice.

It will be noted that the condition of the bond is simply "for the faithful performance of said duties," not that he will not do unlawful and unauthorized acts—that he will not commit torts and wrongs affecting the rights of individuals.

Now, that statute has been up for construction many times, and it never has been held that the marshal is liable for a tort committed by him while in the discharge of his duties, such as an illegal arrest, or an assault and battery, or a murder, or anything of that character. The bond is for the faithful discharge of his duties, and it does not bind his sureties so as to make them responsible for assaults and batteries or anything of that sort, something that it is not his duty to do.

Mr. TERRY. I should like to ask the gentleman if the marshal and his deputies are not responsible for acts done under color of their office?

Mr. RAY. They are personally responsible, of course, for all wrongs committed by themselves.

Mr. TERRY. Are not their bondsmen responsible for all acts done under color of their office?

Mr. RAY. These officers are responsible personally if they make an illegal arrest.

Mr. TERRY. Are not their bondsmen responsible?

Mr. RAY. They are responsible personally if they commit an assault and battery; but their bondsmen are not liable for their torts or wrongs where they go outside of the discharge of their duties.

Mr. TERRY. A malicious assault and battery is not virtute officii, or colore officii—neither by virtue of his office, nor under color of his office—but an illegal arrest, done by a marshal or a deputy marshal, is by color of his office.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. And the bondsmen are responsible?

Mr. RAY. It has never been so held.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It has been so held.

Mr. RAY. It has been held directly the contrary. If an officer departs from the command of the process under which he acts and assumes power and authority, and so commits a wrong while holding office, the sureties in his bond are not liable. If he assumes power that he does not possess and so commits a trespass on property or on the person of another, the sureties are not liable. Such acts are not within the conditions of the bond.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Is there anything in that section that provides that the bondsmen of a United States marshal are not so responsible?

Mr. RAY. It does not read that they are not responsible, nor that they are, for an assault and battery or an illegal arrest.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Or a false imprisonment.

Mr. RAY. Or a false imprisonment. They are liable, undoubtedly, if they commit such an act; but their bondsmen are not liable.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The bondsmen are liable for anything that the officer is liable for, done under color of his office.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. There are ten suits now pending in the courts in the city where I live involving that liability.

Mr. RAY. That may be, but the plaintiff will be defeated.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I was opposed to this measure in the Committee on the Judiciary for substantially the reasons that have been so ably urged by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. I am still opposed to this measure. The ostensible purpose for which the passage of this bill is urged is to accomplish the arrest of "green-goods men."

Now, in order to accomplish one particular object it is proposed to enact the vicious legislation of arming post-office inspectors with the power to make arrests in all cases of alleged violations of the postal laws. If there is real necessity for legislation of this kind, so as to reach the dealers in "green goods," why not limit the bill to that?

Mr. MILES. The purpose of the bill is only to reach cases growing out of the violation of the postal laws.

Mr. TERRY. Oh, I understand that; but the real violation of the postal laws which you say you want to stop by this drastic measure is the dealing in green goods.

Now, if that be the object of the bill, why not limit it to that? Why clothe these petty officials with this sweeping power to invade the sacred rights of the American citizen? There is already too much machinery provided in this land for the invasion of the rights of American citizens. This is another stone piled upon that towering Cæsar's column that is already overshadowing the liberties of the people of this country.

Mr. RAY. May I ask my colleague a question right there?

Mr. TERRY. I will yield to you later on. I say there is already too much machinery. It is already too easy for an irresponsible power to trample under foot the rights of American freemen. It is sufficient that the marshals and deputy marshals and sheriffs and deputy sheriffs—men who, by coming into constant contact with the courts and the judges, are taught something of conservatism, are taught to respect the rights of the citizen—it is enough that men of that character, who learn conservatism by judicial contact, should be clothed with the right to arrest American citizens.

Now it is proposed to send forth the creatures of the civil service—these petty Federal officials—clothed with the right, without warrant, to arrest an American citizen! Do you members here know how officious a lot these petty post-office inspectors and officials are? How they are constantly, in order to secure a record of efficiency, hounding the hard-worked and poorly paid fourth-class postmaster, and deviling him with all kinds of petty criminations and charges? Do you want to have that evil legalized and spread over all the districts of this country? But they say if the inspector arrests one wrongfully, that he can be prosecuted and held in damages. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois has pointed out how unavailing that remedy will be in the hands of a citizen who has been wronged. These officials are birds of passage, here to-day and yonder to-morrow. Why, if you sue one of these post-office officials and obtain a judgment against him, you might as well have a mortgage on a last year's whip-poor-will's nest.

Now, sir, in addition to that, suppose some fourth-class postmaster, in some remote rural section in Illinois, Arkansas, Texas, or any other part of this great country, has been arrested and dragged down to the Federal court, perhaps 300 or 400 miles from his residence——

Mr. CANNON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TERRY. Not at present. (Continuing.) And he wants to bring suit. In the first place, if he brings suit, as he might, against the sheriff or the deputy sheriff in his county where the offense was committed, the post-office inspector, under another law on the Federal statute, could have the case transferred to the United States courts, and the fourth-class postmaster, or any other citizen whose rights had been invaded, would have to take his witnesses hundreds of miles to prosecute and obtain his rights; and then, at the expiration of a long, harassing litigation, have a judgment against a petty officer that he could not make a cent on. Now I yield to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I want to see if I understand the object of this legislation. This is to give to post-office inspectors power to act as United States marshals in prosecution of offenses under the postal laws. In any district of the United States that they find a postmaster or a post-office official violating the postal laws, they may arrest him with or without warrant, as the case may be.

Mr. TERRY. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Now let me ask my friend if they retain this power that they have now. Am I correct in supposing that they can go and make complaint before a commissioner or judge, as the case may be, and get a warrant?

Mr. TERRY. They will have to go and make a formal complaint and obtain a warrant.

Mr. CANNON. And then the deputy marshal can execute it.

Mr. TERRY. Then the deputy marshal can execute it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, am I correct in this: If the post-office official were to escape from the district in which he committed the crime and go into another district, that the complaint could be made in that district and the man arrested?

Mr. TERRY. Why, certainly; there is ample machinery.

Mr. CANNON. And by that machinery, anywhere in the boundaries of the United States, is he not pretty apt to be caught?

Mr. TERRY. He is pretty apt to be caught. We have the machinery. It is already sufficient; and I think it is a dangerous precedent to clothe any set of men with authority to arrest, unless it is that character of men who have learned, as I have already stated, some degree of conservatism from contact with judicial officers.

Now, I differ with my friend from New York [Mr. RAY] in regard to the liability of the marshal and deputy marshal upon his bond. It has been my understanding of the law that a marshal is responsible for any act that he does by color of his office. He is responsible for an illegal arrest; he is responsible if, while he has a man under illegal arrest, he maltreats him, pretending that it was necessary in order to effect the arrest.

Mr. MILES. But not his bondsmen.

Mr. TERRY. Even his bondsmen.

Mr. MILES. Under this law? Because of maltreatment?

Mr. TERRY. His bondsmen are responsible, as I understand the law, for all his acts done by color of his office, but not for any malicious or willful acts done outside of that. I understand that to be the law. That has been held to be the law in my State.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to consume the time of the House unnecessarily, but I do insist that this is not a proper measure. If the evil specially complained of is of such extent as to attract the attention of the Post-Office Department, why do they not recommend a law to authorize arrests in that class of cases? That would be the proper remedy. Mr. Speaker, it is an old saying that "hard cases make bad law," and so it may be said that extreme cases upon which legislation is invoked generally result in the enactment of bad laws. I reserve the balance of my time, and yield five minutes to my colleague, Mr. NEILL.

Mr. NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my dissent from the provisions of this bill. In my judgment it is unnecessary, and in my opinion it would invest these post-office inspectors with an authority not contemplated by the laws of this country, and would result in a species of persecution and prosecution not expected or desired by the American people. I happen to have had, in my brief time here as a Representative, at least one case which may serve to exemplify the injustice and oppression that might be wrought under this bill if it should become a law. I had a case in which a post-office inspector visited a fourth-class post-office in the Sixth Congressional district of Arkansas and made an investigation, and recommended and insisted that the postmaster should be removed upon mere technicalities and quibbles which amounted to nothing. I myself made an appeal to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General. I went to the Department and presented the whole correspondence, from which it appeared that this post-office inspector had been acting as a sleuthhound, had been nosing around, looking up little matters in which there was not the slightest malfeasance or misfeasance or any indication whatever of intentional wrong. More than this, that inspector, before he left the village where that post-office is situate, gave it out to outside parties that the postmaster would be removed. In consequence of that action, I was besieged by a person desiring to be appointed to the prospective vacancy before the inspector's report was received by the Post-Office Department in this city. Now, if that post-office inspector had been invested with the power which this bill would give him, it is not to be doubted that the postmaster would have been arrested, dragged to Little Rock, and incarcerated in jail there until he could be tried by a Federal court. I went before the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, and he, like an honest man, after investigating the whole matter, said, "Mr. NEILL, I will not remove your man. He shall not be removed, because there is no evidence of any intention on his part to do wrong." That case illustrates what might be done under this bill if it were the law, and I hope that it will be voted down.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, there never has been a proposition before this Congress to invest anyone with the power to make arrests but some attorney on the floor has felt called upon to defend the defendant. There is one phase of the human mind which has often been presented to my notice, but which I have never been able to comprehend. That is the fear, apparently the honest fear, which seems to possess the average Congressman that he or some of his friends may suffer injustice by being arrested by Federal officials.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in two or three days I shall have lived fifty years in this world, yet I have never been arrested. So far as I know I have never even been in danger of suffering from the severe hand of the law which our friend from Arkansas has so eloquently referred to.

Mr. TERRY. Maybe you ought to have been. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Possibly, but I never have been. However that may be, Mr. Speaker, my experience has taught me that a man who obeys the laws of his country need not fear the oppressive hand of the officers of the law. Here is a measure which has been presented to Congress year after year ever since I have been a member. Four or five of the best lawyers in this body appeared on behalf of the Government to urge the passage of the bill. My friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] evidently thought that the defendant needed some one on this floor to defend his case. What does this bill propose? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] well know that it simply proposes to put in the hands of the post-office inspectors—and let me say that a finer body of men is not to be found in this country; a body of men compared with whom the average deputy marshal or deputy sheriff sinks into insignificance—the bill simply proposes to put in the hands of these men the power of making arrests——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly, if it is pertinent to this phase of the case.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman whether this bill was not considered by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and whether that committee did not decide not to report the bill to the House?

Mr. LOUD. No, Mr. Speaker; emphatically, no.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, I have been misinformed by a member of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, well, I want to say to the gentleman that if he accepts the information he may get from some one member of the Post-Office Committee, he will be misinformed and misled all the time. [Laughter.] The Post-Office Committee did consider this measure. I introduced it myself, at the request of the Post-Office Department and the Department of Justice. As it involved legal questions, the Post-Office Committee unanimously recommended that it be reported back to the House and be referred to the proper committee, the Committee on the Judiciary. Now, the gentleman from Arkansas seems to assume that somebody has said that the sole object of giving the inspectors this power is that they may arrest green-goods men. I would like to ask the gentleman where he got that idea?

Mr. TERRY. That was stated as a reason before the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman who opened the discussion in favor of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman's own good sense should have taught him that that was only an insignificant part of the objects of this bill. There are hundreds and hundreds of offenses committed against the postal laws; the gentleman well knows that. Post-office inspectors—there are but 104 in the whole United States—are selected by reason of their eminent fitness and ability for these very positions.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. LOUD. I am liable never to get ahead if I continue to yield to other gentlemen; but I will yield once more.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I ask this question simply for information, for I assume the gentleman from California knows all about these matters: A post-office inspector gives bond, I suppose, for the faithful discharge of his duty?

Mr. LOUD, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman ought to know as much about that as I do. I will say to him, however, that a post-office inspector does not give bond.

Now, here is the position: A post-office inspector is located, we will suppose, in the city of New York to detect persons who are abstracting money from letters—persons who may be in the postal service, or outside of it. The inspector is upon the trail of the offender in many instances for one, two, and three months; and when the criminal is discovered, the inspector has no power to arrest him. He must go before a commissioner and make complaint; and upon that complaint a warrant is issued. Then a deputy marshal goes and makes the arrest. The innocent citizen whom gentlemen suppose to be oppressed by this power of arrest feels in this indirect manner the strong arm of the law just as severely as though the inspector himself made the arrest. But if the party be really guilty, he will in many cases, before the arrest can be made, have escaped; so that the months of labor that the post-office inspector has spent upon the case are lost.

I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, that there was any debate whatever on this question. When I talked with the Judiciary Committee it was assumed that this measure could pass by unanimous consent. I do not believe there should be a single vote in opposition to it. For the purpose of assisting in the better performance of the duties devolving upon these officers this power should be granted to them.

Mr. TERRY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as a very important bill, reaching much further in its provisions or their effect than might be concluded from a cursory reading of the measure. The bill proposes to confer upon post-office inspectors an entirely new power. It proposes to clothe them with the same authority to make arrests that is now possessed by United States marshals and their deputies. If this House will pardon a personal reference, I want to say, drawing upon my personal experience, that when I was assistant United States district attorney I had a good deal of experience with United States marshals and United States post-office inspectors; and, remembering that experience, I can not help saying to this House that to pass this bill would, in my opinion, be a very great mistake and one which this House would be swift in the future to correct.

There are several objections, Mr. Speaker, to this bill. In the first place, I assume—although there seems to be some objection to that assumption, especially on the part of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], a member of the Judiciary Committee—that the majority of the lawyers of this House will agree with me in saying that when a United States marshal or his deputy, having given bond in compliance with the Federal statute, makes a false and unwarranted arrest, that officer is liable for the consequences arising from said arrest. But in this bill there is no provision requiring post-office inspectors to give bond for the faithful performance of their duty. In other words, you will authorize these inspectors to arrest without giving bond, but require marshals to do so.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me a moment? No one has denied that if a marshal or his deputy makes a false or unlawful arrest, he is liable for it. Nobody denies that proposition. The only question that has been mooted here is whether or not the bondsmen are liable in the case of such a false arrest.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Well, I will make my proposition broad enough to include the bondsmen. I am willing to submit that proposition to the judgment of the lawyers of the House, if they have time to pass upon it.

A MEMBER. The bondsmen ought to be liable.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I do not think there is any doubt that they are. I know that in the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor that question has been decided in our courts within the last three weeks, and a verdict has been rendered by a jury against an officer and his bondsmen for a false arrest, committed in the city which I represent. I had not supposed there was a single lawyer on the floor of this House, much less a lawyer upon the honorable and dignified Judiciary Committee, who would question this proposition. To pass this bill will confer upon a large number of men power which, as I have stated, they do not now possess, and which, in my view, will be dangerous to be used by them.

The distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] who last spoke in favor of this bill said that a man who always obeyed the law need never fear an unlawful arrest. I must combat that proposition. I wish to say that within the last twelve months a gentleman living near my own city was arrested for the commission of the most heinous offense that has ever occurred in our State—a deliberate, cold-blooded murder, committed under the most atrocious circumstances. Yet, at the preliminary hearing it was shown to the satisfaction of everyone that that man did not commit the crime, and in the very nature of the circumstances surrounding the tragedy could not possibly have done so. And yet, all his life he will have to live under the shadow, and his children and his children's children will have to live under the shadow, of his having been arrested and charged with that most awful murder. Men are being arrested almost every day in this country charged with crimes that they never committed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Another very serious objection to this bill, in my opinion, is this, that these post-office inspectors are always on the wing. The distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] said a moment ago that he would just as soon undertake to sue a last year's whip-poor-will's nest as to sue one of these post-office inspectors. I would just as lief undertake to sue the bird itself. We can always find the nest, but we can not find the bird. How are you going to get jurisdiction of a post-office inspector? There is not a word in this bill conferring jurisdiction. A United States marshal and his deputy always have a situs, and a party knows where he can go and bring his suit. You can always find them, and you know your jurisdiction. But these post-office inspectors, as every man knows who has ever had anything to do with them, are always traveling, always on the wing. So it would be practically impossible to serve them with a writ.

I do not desire to limit the right to arrest for crime. I think that ought to be conferred on the proper officers, and it ought to be guarded with great jealousy. But I am opposed to the provisions of this bill, which give every post-office inspector of this Government, in addition to the power he now possesses, the right to invade a home and arrest a man or a member of his family, under a power equal to that possessed by the United States marshal or deputy marshal. It is too dangerous a power to be conferred upon any class of men without the most mature and deliberate consideration, and I hope the bill will be defeated.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE].

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Speaker, appreciating as I do the good judgment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] and of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY], I am a little surprised at their opposition to this bill.

There is nothing in this bill that confers on these post-office inspectors the power to arrest any one where there is not a showing that they are guilty of some offense, that they have been guilty of a violation of law.

Gentlemen who oppose this bill proceed upon the idea, it occurs to me, that these inspectors, as soon as this authority is vested in them, will start out seeking to arrest and imprison innocent people wherever they may find them. Now, that is not in keeping with human nature. On the contrary, men are more liable to let the guilty go unwhipt of justice than they are to go out and seek an opportunity to arrest innocent men.

What is there in this bill? It simply confers upon post-office inspectors the power to arrest an individual who has been guilty of a violation of the law. It does not confer upon him the right to take that man and put him in prison; it does not confer upon this inspector the right to pass judgment upon the guilt or innocence of this man; but it simply confers upon him the authority to arrest a man who has been guilty of some violation of law and take him before a court of competent jurisdiction, there to answer for the violation of law.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Well, he may have to imprison him in order to get him there.

Mr. KYLE. If he is guilty, they ought to hold him. Yes, and he should be held until he has had a trial to determine his case.

Mr. TERRY. Suppose a post-office inspector thinks a man is guilty when he is not guilty, can he arrest him?

Mr. KYLE. Oh, well, in all the experiences of life we have to deal with men whom we think guilty. Every day that rolls around, men are arrested for murder, arson, and for all those offenses.

Mr. TERRY. I understand that; but there is redress for false imprisonment.

Mr. KYLE. Men are arrested every day, and if they go before the court and they are found innocent they are turned loose.

Mr. TERRY. The distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] says this bill only authorizes arrests of men who are guilty. That is the statement which the gentleman just made.

Mr. KYLE. Oh, well, if I said that, I did not mean to make the statement as broad as that. I intended to be sensible about it, if I knew how to be.

Mr. TERRY. I thought you did.

Mr. KYLE. All people who are arrested are not always proven to be guilty. Now, this proposition simply involves the propriety of conferring upon these inspectors the right to arrest a man who has been guilty of a violation of law. Suppose my friend from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] was a post-office inspector, and he came down to Mississippi, into the district which I have the honor to represent, and found some postmaster there had been guilty of malfeasance in office, that he had been wrongfully appropriating the receipts of his office, or that he had been guilty of some other offense against the postal laws. As the law stands now, while he might know that that man had been playing the rôle of a thief, before he could do anything with him he would have to go and hunt up a commissioner or some other official legally authorized to administer an oath, swear out an affidavit against him, procure his warrant, and then arrest the man whom he had ascertained was guilty of a malfeasance in office, and before he could find a marshal to execute the warrant the fellow would be gone.

Now, with that sort of roundabout way of getting at it, the postmaster, who knows himself he is guilty, when he finds that this inspector is there and is going to find it out, while he is going and hunting a commissioner to make out his affidavit and then the marshal to make the arrest, the bird has flown.

Mr. LINNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KYLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINNEY. Is there any State in this Union that confers upon any citizen thereof the right to make arrest, except where a crime has been committed in the presence of the officer, without an affidavit upon which the warrant issued?

Mr. KYLE. I believe that is the general rule; but we are proposing to make a law here. Now, that is what we are proposing to do in this bill. But there is nothing in it that proposes to confer upon these inspectors any authority to make an arrest which a United States marshal does not have.

Mr. LINNEY. Would you be willing to confer any such right upon any citizen?

Mr. LOUD. They can not arrest your moonshiners. This is only for offenses against the postal laws.

Mr. KYLE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that there is anything in the suggestion made by the gentleman from North Carolina. If there is danger from the source that gentleman indicates, that ought to be considered; but I submit to the good judgment and the good sense of this House that there is no danger to come from that source, because it is not in keeping with the experience of men upon this floor that men seek opportunity and run in great haste to arrest men who are innocent and men against whom there is not, to say the least of it, a probability of guilt, as shown upon affidavit to be made before a commissioner authorized to administer oaths. I do not know of any such practice as that. I do not know of any officer who ever exercised authority in that way. Well, now, if our experience does not call to mind some officers going in that direction, why we are to get scared about it I can not see. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. TERRY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, my friend from North Carolina, in the question he propounded to my friend from Mississippi, has suggested the idea I have in mind. If I understand the existing law, any marshal or deputy marshal, or any sheriff or deputy sheriff, has no right to arrest a citizen except by warrant duly issued, unless it be for an offense committed in the presence of the officer. Now, that being true, it seems to me that this bill is ambiguous. What does it mean? Does it mean that a post-office inspector can make arrest where a warrant has been issued, as the marshal or deputy marshal or sheriff or deputy sheriff can; or does it mean that he can without any warrant, simply upon inquiry, simply upon information, arrest a citizen? If it means that, it seems to me it goes too far, to place it in the power of any individual, without a warrant and without an affidavit on which that warrant is based, to arrest a citizen in respect to a crime that is not within his knowledge or committed in his presence. That is going much further than Congressional or State legislation has gone heretofore.

Mr. RAY. May I interrupt the gentleman just a minute?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. This bill does not confer any power upon the post-office inspectors that is not now vested by law in the marshals. It is intended to give the one the power now possessed by the other.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, now, that is the question.

Mr. RAY. It reads that they are to have the same power of arrest precisely that is now by law vested in the marshal.

Mr. PATTERSON. But I will say to my friend the advocates of this bill, in every speech they have made, have made it upon the assumption that the inspector would have the same power to make an arrest that a marshal, a deputy marshal, a sheriff, or a deputy sheriff would have after the warrant had been issued. If that is the meaning of it, the bill goes too far; if it is not the meaning of it, this bill is unobjectionable.

Mr. RAY. Permit me. If they have proceeded thus, it has been upon a wrong basis, an incorrect understanding of the bill, because this bill is intended to cover this proposition and none other—that if the inspectors should have a warrant in their hands, they may arrest; if they do not have a warrant, they can not arrest, unless the offense is committed in their presence.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, there is no objection to that.

Mr. RAY. That is all that the bill is intended to accomplish.

Mr. PATTERSON. There is no objection whatever to that, but that is not the scope of this bill, as explained by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE]. It is not the scope of the bill as explained by my friend from California [Mr. LOUD]. They assume that this inspector has the same power to make arrest, without a warrant, which the marshal and sheriff has with a warrant.

Mr. MILES. Oh, no.

Mr. KYLE. I do not say that.

Mr. RAY. That is not the intent.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then I wish to say——

Mr. KYLE. What I sought to say was this: That the inspector might go before a commissioner and swear out a warrant and then go and make the arrest without having to go and look up a United States marshal and let the fellow escape.

Mr. RAY. And he makes the arrest under the warrant.

Mr. KYLE. And by virtue of it; and there is nothing in this bill, let me say to my friend, that would warrant him in making an arrest otherwise.

Mr. BRUMM. Under a warrant, as just stated?

Mr. TERRY. Can not the sheriff or deputy sheriff, for probable cause, in his judgment, make an arrest?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not unless the crime is committed in his presence.

Mr. RAY. My friend is correct. He might arrest if the offense were committed in his presence; but a citizen might do that in most of the States under the State law, and it does seem just and proper. But if they are proceeding simply upon information or belief, then they must go to a competent officer and make their proof and get their warrant, and then proceed under that. Now let me say to my friend here that all this bill does, all this bill purports to do, is to enable the inspector to go with his evidence to a commissioner or other proper officer, make his proof, and if that officer sees fit to issue a warrant, the inspector may take it and go immediately and make the arrest, and not have to delay to go, in many cases 20, 50, and perhaps 100 miles, to get the marshal. If the offense is committed in his presence, he may arrest without a warrant. The great object sought is to enable inspectors to make arrests in proper cases, and to execute warrants of arrest when to delay would enable offenders to escape.

Mr. PATTERSON. But that is not the meaning of this bill, and that is not how it is understood by its advocates. It has been construed upon this floor, as I understand, to mean that the inspectors shall have the same power to make arrests which a marshal or a sheriff has after the warrant is issued. If that is not the meaning, it seems to me that the bill ought to be amended so as to relieve it from the ambiguity which evidently exists. The language of the bill is:

> The same power in executing the law governing the postal service of the United States as marshals and their deputies and sheriffs and their deputies in such States may have, by law, in executing the laws thereof.

Now, what is the meaning of that? Does it mean what the gentleman from New York says, or does it mean what the gentleman from California contends it means? I insist that the bill ought to be amended so as to make it mean exactly what the gentleman from New York describes.

Mr. RAY. Permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that no man on the Judiciary Committee had the slightest idea that any such construction could be given to the language of the bill. As my friend from Tennessee states, some gentlemen have given that construction to the bill in discussing it to-day, but I do not believe any such construction can properly be given to it. We certainly ought not to give these post-office inspectors any broader powers than the marshals and deputies have now.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then would it not be well to have this bill recommitted to the committee and have a measure so framed as to be free from the objections that have been raised to this one?

Mr. RAY. It can be amended here in three minutes if it is found necessary to amend it. I do not think, however, that any good lawyer who scans the bill carefully will claim that it bears the construction suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, the question that to me seems most important in this case is whether or not the bill consolidates the power of the judiciary with that of the constabulary; in other words, whether they are thrown into one. If it does that, it strikes me that that alone ought to be sufficient to defeat this bill. As I understand it, it is proposed by this bill to permit the post-office inspectors to act as judges in the first instance and to determine whether, in their opinion, the man is guilty or not.

Mr. MILES. How does the gentleman get that construction?

Mr. BRUMM. I get it from the gentleman who has stated it here, and I have not heard it contradicted. Now, if the proper construction of this bill bears the gentleman out, or if there is any danger of that construction being taken as the right one, then the bill ought not to pass. As we all know, the post-office inspectors are birds of passage. They can and do travel anywhere and everywhere over the country. They are usually without any local habitation when they are engaged in their work. Any dishonest man may personate a post-office inspector, may visit a post-office, and may utilize this power of arrest to make it easier for him to rob the post-office and the postmaster. Give the inspectors the power proposed in this bill, and you increase the danger of this evil. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that these are sufficient reasons why this bill should not pass.

Mr. LAYTON. Read the statement in the report about giving them power to arrest without warrant.

Mr. BRUMM (reading):

> This will enable the inspectors to arrest without warrant upon reasonable suspicion justified by the facts and circumstances surrounding the case, but will not relieve them from liability for arrests made without reasonable care. The efficiency of the postal service will be greatly promoted by the passage of the bill as recommended.

So that, as has been stated here, these men will have the power to arrest anybody without warrant, and, being mere birds of flight, they will be entirely irresponsible and can not be called to account. Such a grant of power is against the genius of our institutions, and ought not to be tolerated.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this bill, it seems to me, is both unnecessary and dangerous. I have had considerable experience in practicing before the United States courts in cases involving violations, or alleged violations, of the postal laws, and it is quite clear to me that this bill ought not to pass. In the first place, it is objectionable upon general principles. The liberties of the citizen should never be endangered, nor should any official be authorized to trespass upon them except on the ground of absolute necessity.

There is no necessity to confer the power to make arrests upon these post-office inspectors. That power is now vested in the marshals and their deputies, who are amply able to execute the process of the courts, or to make arrests without such process where the circumstances and the law justify such action. In the next place, these inspectors are not lawyers. They are appointed simply to go around and inspect the post-offices. I ask the House to bear in mind that an arrest for alleged violations of Federal law involves almost invariably carrying the accused person away from his home and from the vicinage in which he lives, at great expense and hardship, to a remote point. Gentlemen say, "If people do not violate the laws they will not be arrested." It is not so, Mr. Speaker. The postal laws contain many provisions violations of which are not necessarily criminal, provisions which may be technically violated by mere mistake or ignorance. A post-office inspector will feel authorized to go into a community, and, if there happens in his sight an occurrence which he chooses to construe into a violation of the law, to arrest a citizen or a number of citizens and take them away 100 or 200 or 500 miles to the seat of the United States court or before a commissioner—without a warrant, without affidavit, without the judgment of any judicial officer that such arrest is necessary or that any offense has been committed. This involves a great hardship, and one wholly unnecessary to the execution of the law.

Let me illustrate. I have known a case where a post-office was located half a mile or a mile outside of the village that it served; and the mail carrier from that office every day passed through the business portion of the village while carrying the mail to the railroad station. Now, certain merchants, for convenience, would mail their letters with the mail carrier, because otherwise they would be required to go half a mile or a mile in the other direction to mail them at the post-office. In such a case an overzealous post-office inspector attempted to have a number of leading citizens of that community arrested and carried a hundred or two hundred miles from their homes to answer a charge of conspiracy to decrease the salary of the postmaster. A commissioner oftentimes would refuse to issue a warrant in such a case, where it was apparent to him that no offense had been committed or that the matter was trivial. But an overzealous or ignorant post-office inspector—not an inhabitant of the State, not under bond, not coming in contact with the people—might go into a community and arrest one man or a dozen men and take them to a remote locality at great expense, take them away from their business, away from their friends, subject them to the expense of employing counsel, possibly keeping them temporarily in jail while their cases were pending before the commissioner or while sureties were being obtained.

Mr. TERRY. I yield to my friend from Florida one minute more.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. It must be remembered, as I have said, that most of the charges of Federal offenses involve the taking of the accused from his home to a distant place. Is there any necessity for the passage of this bill? Are we not now enforcing our postal laws? Can not the regular bonded officers and their deputies enforce those laws? Can not the commissioner appointed by the court, and supposed to have some judicial knowledge, enforce the law? Can not the United States marshal or his deputies be relied on to make arrests wherever they are proper? This bill is without necessity; it is oppressive; its passage offers no advantage commensurate with the danger of this kind of legislation. It is against the genius of our institutions, which are opposed to putting the liberty of the citizen into the hands of any official where it can be avoided.

Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] five minutes, or such time as he may desire.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, in order that it may be further understood that this bill was not reported with the concurrence of all the members of the Judiciary Committee, I wish to say that when the matter came up in that committee at a time when I was present, I expressed my opposition to it, which still exists. I was not present, however, at the meeting when it was decided to report the bill.

I will not take the time of the House by going into the merits or demerits of the bill. Because it is alleged that there are violations of the postal laws which are not easy of punishment, it is claimed that extraordinary, unheard-of powers should be conferred upon the post-office inspectors. How far these powers go, how far they will be executed, how they may be abused, no one can guess; no one knows.

A large share of bad law originates in good intentions, directed to particular abuses. Those abuses being in view, the greater abuses which may arise from the supposed remedy applied to them, are lost to sight and lost to consideration. That is the case I think with regard to this measure. If it were possible by law to provide that when one who violates the postal laws can be arrested and prosecuted in no other way, he may be arrested or prosecuted by clothing, for the time being, these inspectors with extraordinary powers, good might result. But to authorize the inspectors—a horde of them—not bonded with respect to such duties, to make arrests when and where and how they please, is a very dangerous thing.

It is said that if these officials abuse the power proposed to be conferred upon them, they may be proceeded against for this abuse. A poor remedy would that be in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred for the person who might be the victim of that abuse of power. Far better to endeavor to arrest violators of law in a lawful way than to make lawful what, according to all correct canons of interpretation and all correct systems of jurisprudence ever since civilization advanced into law, has been regarded as lawless and dangerous. I think the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Is there a minority report against this bill?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not know that there is.

Mr. BAILEY. It happened that I was not in attendance upon the sessions of the Judiciary Committee when this bill was under consideration, and I know nothing about it. I was at that time attending a meeting of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not know whether there is a minority report, the measure having been passed upon by the committee at a time when, as I have said, I was not present.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. After the amendment is read I ask to have the bill read as it will read when amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, page 1, after the word "thereof," add the following: "Provided, That the power of arrest or detention shall not exist in any case without a warrant or process, unless the offense is committed in the presence of such inspector;" so that the bill as amended will read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That any person duly appointed as an inspector of the Post-Office establishment of the United States by the Postmaster-General shall have, in each State, the same powers in executing the laws governing the postal service of the United States as the marshals and their deputies and the sheriffs and their deputies in such State may have, by law, in executing the laws thereof: Provided, That the power of arrest or detention shall not exist in any case without a warrant or process, unless the offense is committed in the presence of such inspector."

The amendment of Mr. RAY was agreed to.

The amendments recommended by the committee, striking out sections 2, 3, and 4, were agreed to.

The question was taken on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

On a division (demanded by Mr. TERRY) there were—ayes 69, noes 51.

Mr. TERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let it go to the passage.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Will not the gentleman consent that the yeas and nays be taken on the passage of the bill?

Mr. TERRY. We can take the yeas and nays now, and settle it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 94, not voting 144; as follows:

Mr. ABBOTT. I was called from the House when my name was called. I should like to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HENDERSON). Under the rule the gentleman would not be permitted to vote now, if he was absent when his name was called.

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to vote. As I entered the door, I heard my name called, but I was not in time to vote intelligently.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman being absent from the Hall at the time his name was called, the Chair does not think he can entertain the request.

Mr. ADAMS. I was in the House at the time my name was called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman could have answered to his name.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. OTEY, has not been excused, I ask that he be excused on account of illness in his family. I was with him last night when he received a telegram announcing the illness of his grandchild.

There being no objection, Mr. OTEY was excused.

Mr. CROWTHER. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. VAN HORN, who has been called from the House on account of sickness in his family.

There was no objection.

Mr. STROWD of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. MARTIN, has been called home on account of the illness of his brother, and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:
Mr. HAINER of Nebraska with Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTON of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is nothing further from the Committee on the Judiciary to-day.

INCREASE OF CIRCULATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS (when the Committee on Banking and Currency was called). Mr. Speaker, I present for consideration the bill (H. R. 849) increasing the circulation of national banks.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon deposits by national banking associations of United States bonds, bearing interest as provided by law under the provisions of sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes, such associations shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by existing law, equal in face value to the full par value of the bonds so deposited; and national banking associations now having bonds on deposit for the security of circulating notes less in face value than the par value of the bonds, or which may hereafter have such bonds on deposit, shall be entitled, upon due application to the Comptroller of the Currency, to receive additional circulating notes in blank to an amount which will increase the aggregate value of the circulating notes held by such associations to the par value of the bonds deposited, such additional notes to be held and treated in the same way as circulating notes of national banking associations heretofore issued, and subject to all the provisions of existing law affecting such notes: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to modify or repeal the provisions of sections 5167 and 5171 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency to require additional deposits of bonds or of lawful money in case the market value of the bonds held to secure the circulating notes shall fall below the par value of the circulating notes outstanding for which such bonds may be deposited as security.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this bill is improperly on the House Calendar and not in order during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the ground of his point of order.

Mr. MCRAE. The ground is this: That it will necessarily involve a charge on the Treasury to furnish the increased issue of notes. Under the national banking act the Government is required to furnish the notes to the bank, and if this increase is authorized by this bill, it will necessarily involve a charge on the Treasury, and therefore indirectly appropriates money and should be upon the Union Calendar.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that it will result in a profit to the Treasury, inasmuch as the national banks are taxed 1 per cent on their circulation, and therefore there would be no charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. MCRAE. Then if the bill raises revenue, that is another reason why it is not now in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I had no notice that this bill would come up, and I have not a copy of the rules before me, and can not now refer to any decisions, but I submit to the judgment of the Chair that, as this bill will indirectly involve a charge upon the Treasury, it ought not be considered during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that very remote.

Mr. MCRAE. Then I raise the question of consideration against the bill. It ought not to pass.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, Will the House consider the bill?

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MCRAE. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 126, noes 28.

Mr. MCRAE. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-seven gentlemen have risen in support of the demand for the yeas and nays—not a sufficient number.

Mr. MCRAE. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-nine gentlemen have risen in support of the demand for tellers. Thirty-six are required to order tellers. Not a sufficient number has risen. Tellers are refused; the yeas and nays are refused; the ayes have it, and the House decides to consider the bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COX. The bill coming from the Committee on Banking and Currency is now to be considered. I wish to make an inquiry how long we would have to discuss this bill?

The SPEAKER. Unlimited time, if the House chooses to give it.

Mr. COX. My idea was this, Mr. Speaker: A bill of this importance ought not to be passed without full discussion. The gentleman knows, as I know, the minority of the committee who reported this bill are opposed to it. Now, what I was trying to arrive at was the time for discussion in regard to the matter, not a vote, so the House should understand what this bill means.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not understand what the gentleman means by saying that a majority of the committee are opposed to this bill.

Mr. COX. I did not say that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I beg pardon. I understood the gentleman to say a majority of the committee were opposed to it.

Mr. COX. I said the minority were opposed to the bill.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. COX. What would suit the gentleman from Ohio? I suggest that we go on with the debate, and then come to some arrangement.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, thirty minutes on a side.

Mr. COX. Oh, no. I suggest that we go on with the debate, and then that we come to some conclusion when we ascertain the feeling of the House.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to any arrangement that does not allow full debate of this bill either four or six hours or the whole of to-day's session. I want an hour.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I suggest that the gentlemen may agree when the debate shall have proceeded for some time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is in charge of the bill.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the time be limited to an hour on a side.

The SPEAKER. The way in which the gentleman can reach the question of limitation is this: He has charge of the bill, and can move the previous question; and if he is supported by the House, that will determine the question. There is no other way except that or agreement.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Then I ask for the previous question.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Surely the gentleman does not wish to pass the bill without any debate?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There will be no trouble in extending the time after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the previous question is ordered, it takes unanimous consent to extend it beyond the time fixed by the rules.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Perhaps it would be wise to extend it to that extent.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We can not understand that you will always be wise on your side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for the previous question.

Mr. MCMILLIN. A parliamentary inquiry. That, I believe, gives only twenty minutes' debate on a side?

The SPEAKER. That gives twenty minutes' debate on a side.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and the Speaker announced that the yeas seemed to have it.

Mr. MCRAE, Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts, and others. Division!

The question was taken; and pending the announcement,

Mr. MILES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 87, not voting 118; as follows:

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak just three minutes.

Several members objected.

The following additional pairs were announced:

On this vote:

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska with Mr. HUTCHESON.

Mr. DOLLIVER with Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi.

Mr. THOMAS with Mr. CATCHINGS.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is ordered, and twenty minutes for debate on either side is allowed under the rules of the House. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] is recognized to control the time in the affirmative, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] to control the time in the negative.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, desires an hour's time in which to address the House, and in view of the position he occupies on the committee and his long service in the House, I ask unanimous consent that that time be accorded him, apart from the twenty minutes on each side allowed under the rule for debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] may be allowed one hour outside of the forty minutes allowed by the rule for debate. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is going to speak in support of the bill, of course we shall expect the same courtesy to be extended to those opposing it.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will say frankly to the House that I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to the request unless it is agreed that a corresponding length of time shall be given to the other side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. What is "the other side?" The gentleman should understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is opposed to the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I will put it in another way. Unless the balance of the House together is allowed a corresponding hour, I shall object to the gentleman from Massachusetts having an hour. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] is recognized.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. One other suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that the time for debate be two hours, one hour on each side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suggest that that would hardly be fair to those who favor the bill, because the gentleman from Massachusetts will speak an hour in opposition to the bill, and there will be also twenty minutes allowed to the opposition under the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN and others called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] is recognized.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, under existing law the national banks are authorized to issue circulating notes to an amount equal to 90 per cent of the par value of the bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States for the purpose of securing circulation. By this bill it is proposed to amend existing laws so as to authorize the banks to issue circulating notes to the par value of the bonds deposited with the Treasurer.

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Speaker, if it will not interrupt the gentleman, I wish to ask him if that is the only change it makes in the existing law.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. That is the only change. Under the proposed amendment it would be possible for the banks to issue on the bonds now on deposit with the Treasurer, in addition to the circulation already out, $23,366,850 of circulation. This additional circulation could be given the banks without increasing in any way the burdens of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman for a moment? I wish to withdraw the objection which I made a moment ago to the request that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] should be allowed to occupy an hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. MILNES. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. It would not increase the burdens of the Government, but it would yield a profit to the Government of $237,291 by reason of the tax on the additional circulation that this bill would give to the banks. At the same time the note holder would be absolutely secure, for the bonds of the Government are selling upon the market at a considerable premium, and, in addition to the bond security, the note holder has a first lien upon the assets of the bank. So that we have an increase of circulation, which would benefit the banks; we have a profit to the Government, and the note holder would be absolutely secure.

This amendment to our banking laws has been recommended by the Comptroller of the Currency. It was first recommended by John Jay Knox in 1883; and every annual report of every Comptroller since that time has repeated this recommendation. This is all I care to say at present. I reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the ground of opposition to this bill on the part of members of the minority of the committee can be readily explained. There can be no debate about the note holder being secured, even though notes be issued to the par value of the bonds; but there is a difficulty, a very serious one, as I think, which I believe the House has not properly considered. There is no law imperative upon the national banks to take out circulation. The truth is that about eight of the largest banks in the United States take out no circulation at all. Now, I was willing, and am yet, to vote for this bill if it be made imperative upon the banks to take out circulation.

Let me call attention to what in my judgment would be the result of this bill. With the banks holding the bonds, and the circulation unprofitable, because of the high price of the bonds, they refuse to take out circulation. Any practical business man can see at once why they refuse. There is no financial sense in buying bonds at $1.15 or $1.20 for each dollar of bonds and then getting circulation to the amount of only 90 per cent of the face value of the bonds, when the money necessary to purchase the bonds could be otherwise used for the profit of the bank.

Now, what is going to be the result of this bill if it should become a law? Outside of about eight banks in the United States (and they are very large banks), you will advance the price of the bonds. That is what this bill is going to do. Any new bank attempting to organize will have to pay the premium upon bonds held by parties outside the bank. In the meantime the same influences which are operating now to advance the price of the bonds will continue to operate. And when you do that you have done nothing toward increasing the banking circulation; you practically leave the banks in the position in which they now are. There is nothing imperative upon those institutions to take out circulation. Consequently they will content themselves with the profits arising from the interest on the bonds they are bound by law to deposit, and not a dollar of circulation will they take out until they believe they can make money on the circulation. This they decide for themselves, and the amount taken out is fixed by the banks instead of being controlled by law.

Mr. HALL. There is one thing which my friend from Tennessee does not make clear to my mind.

Mr. COX. I hope I shall do so.

Mr. HALL. I do not understand why simply permitting the banks to take out notes to the amount of the par value of their bonds would increase the value of the bonds, unless also the circulation upon those bonds were increased.

Mr. COX. Why, my dear sir, whenever you increase the use of a bond it becomes more valuable. Hence, whenever you can take out more circulation upon a bond, you increase the value of the bond.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Would you not increase the price of the bonds still more by forcing all national banks to become banks of issue?

Mr. COX. My friend has made the mistake which I think several other gentlemen make. It does not follow, because a bank takes out circulation to the value of the bonds which it holds (a proceeding which I contend ought to be made imperative upon them) that the amount of notes taken out in that way will necessarily enter into the circulation of the country. That will depend upon the business of the country. But the very moment you give a national bank the power to take out notes to the amount of the par value of the bonds, and it takes out circulation to that amount, it becomes the interest of the bank that that money shall be put into circulation. Though the notes may be taken out and put in the vaults of the bank—not put in actual circulation—the tax on those notes is charged against the bank at the Treasury Department the very moment they are taken out. Hence it becomes the interest of the banks to put out circulation so as to offset the expense which they incur in taking out their circulation. They are the judges how they will put out these notes, and how many of them they will put out.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the gentleman to object to legislation which will increase the value of our United States bonds?

Mr. COX. I do object to increasing the value of the United States bonds if you propose to continue your bank currency based on such bonds, and then leave it to the holders of the bonds to control the amount of bank circulation in the country.

Mr. HULICK. Do I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to insist upon having these great banks of New York City and other large cities compelled to issue notes to the full amount of their bonds? Is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. COX. No; my idea is to compel them to take out circulation upon their bonds at the par value of those bonds. How they will use the notes when taken out is a matter of banking. But if the notes be taken out, it becomes the interest of the banks to use that circulation instead of holding it locked up in their vaults.

In other words, the tax on circulation attaches to the amount of circulation the bank may be entitled to, and to recover back this expense it becomes the interest of the bank to use its circulation. It obtains it as it wants it, but the tax covers the full amount the bank is entitled to.

Mr. HULICK. You would compel them, therefore, to put out the circulation of their notes into the country.

Mr. COX. No; I propose that they take from the Government an amount of circulation up to the par value of the bonds. Then how they shall use it will be a matter discretionary with the banks.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask my colleague a question, with his permission. Is it not a fact that a large number of the banks which demanded an increase of circulation during the worst of the panic through which we have been going returned the circulation without ever having cut the bands on the packages, and did not utilize it at all?

Mr. COX. That is true; and you will strike the same thing again the first time the occasion arises, because the self-preservation of the banks is a higher law than any we can pass here. Now, I yield the rest of my time to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], with whom I have been serving for so long, and I think he ought to have had the time which he asked for the discussion of this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] be allowed an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] be allowed an hour in which to address the House outside of the regular time allowed by the rules. Is there objection?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, there was a suggestion by the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana] that debate be limited to one hour on a side. This is a very important measure. Copies of the bill have been exhausted, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that one hour on a side be given for discussion, and that the time which has been taken up already be counted in that time. I make that request in view of the fact that copies of the bill have been exhausted, and that opportunity for amendment has been taken away by the previous question. I do not think that is an unreasonable request, concerning so important a measure.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not object to my having an hour.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection, and am willing that the gentleman may have whatever time he wants.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws his objection to the request that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] be allowed one hour. Is there further objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not wish to cut off the gentleman. Now I will renew the request that I made a moment ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that there be an hour for debate on either side, including the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McMILLIN. Including what has been consumed.

Several MEMBERS. No, no.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HULICK. Before the gentleman begins, ought we not to have it determined when a vote shall be taken, so that those of us who are compelled to retire can do so? I think we should be informed when the vote is to be taken.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its great courtesy in giving me an hour by unanimous consent. This question, at this time and in this form, is one of the most momentous questions that this House has had brought before it during the last ten years.

A thing may be proper to be done, desirable to be done, and justice may require that it should be done at one period, and yet it may have in it immense potency of evil if done at another period.

At least three in five, and I believe nine in ten, of the people of this country are under the impression that what is for the banking interests of the country, and what is represented in the banking interests of the country, is opposed to them and their interests. Under these circumstances, and at this time, to even seem to grant any privileges to the banking interests and the money interests of this country is, I want to say to the House, fatal to the best interests of the country, because of its adding to this prejudice. As a naked proposition, to have been voted upon when John J. Knox first recommended that this legislation should be had, or at any time previous to the last five years, this should have passed unanimously. To-day it ought to be voted down unanimously, and I believe that before I get through a very large majority of this House will be of the same opinion, however they may vote.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say first that it is the natural right of every man, or any two men, or any five men combined, to give a promissory note for products to any of their neighbors who will take it. It is the natural right of every man to agree with his neighbor that he will deliver to him any time in the future, near or remote, any given thing.

Our national banking act requires that before five men shall do this they shall deposit with the Government a fee for doing it, and this fee amounts to anywhere from 10 per cent of their capital up to $25,000 for a bank of $250,000 capital up to $2,000,000, in buying its bonds, upon which it then allows them to take out promissory notes to give for titles to products.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. If the gentleman will pardon me a minute. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that this debate, if all the time allowed be occupied, and I imagine it will be, will probably run up to about 6 o'clock, and there would be only a few gentlemen who would remain. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That is a good idea to disperse my audience.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am not going to disperse the gentleman's audience; but I want all the members present when the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the vote upon this question be taken to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the people of this country have helped to build up the national banking system, and it has been one of the most blighting things that has existed in national law, to the whole South and to the Northwest of this country during the last ten years. I believe I can show to this House before I take my seat that this statement is true. Just look at it a moment. In the first place, in every other country the banks issue currency just as freely as they issue checks or drafts; and there is no reason why a bank should not issue its paper money—its currency—absolutely without cost, up to a reasonable amount, namely, the capital of the five persons who have formed the bank, who have put their capital into the bank, and it should be issued without a farthing's cost except the printing of the bank notes. A bank bill is nothing in law or usage but a certified check or a certificate of deposit in the bank to the man holding it. That is all it is to the man who holds it.

Now, the $1,000,000,000 of currency in this country is costing the people of this country in higher rates of interest $60,000,000 at 6 per cent, for the banks are now making nothing on it, and therefore must get $60,000,000 more on their $4,500,000,000 loans. Furthermore, our Treasury is costing $17,000,000 more. That makes $77,000,000 absolutely wasted, taken out of the pockets of the people, in higher prices, in everything they buy. I could demonstrate the accuracy of this statement to any twelve men so as to get a unanimous verdict upon this proposition. Any man can figure their extra cost when he goes to buy goods, boots, shoes, food, clothing. On an average all products are held a year before they are consumed.

Now the rates on loans and discounts in this country are 1 per cent higher than normal, and prices 1 per cent above what they would be under rational banking and currency laws, such as they have in all other civilized countries. A man spending, say, $300 a year loses $3 in higher prices under this system. Another man spends $1,200; his purchases cost $12 extra; and if it be $12,000, it would be $120. This is susceptible of proof. It is shown by the bare statement I have made. I will prove it in another way. The banks carry $800,000,000 of cash reserves and $200,000,000 in deposit in banks as reserves, 3 per cent on which is $6,000,000, which amount, with 6 per cent on the former sum, $48,000,000—a total of $54,000,000, and, adding the $17,000,000 wasted on the public Treasury, amounts to $71,000,000. That is the second way to prove it, for there is not another country in the world where the currency issued by the banks does not more than cover the cash reserves and the total reserves held in the banks worth 6 per cent here to banks while in circulation. That is the second way to prove it. The third way is this: We have $4,500,000,000 of loans and discounts. At least 25 per cent more loans and discounts could be made if the banks issued their currency freely; in country districts more than 50 per cent more. Why, in the Massachusetts banks, as you can see by looking at the appendix to my argument before the Committee on Banking and Currency on February 18, 1897, that I have put on the desks of all members, our loans in New England were 125 per cent to total of deposits and capital under the Suffolk system in 1856, while to-day you can not loan over about 87 per cent even in New England, and much less in the whole country—42 per cent more in 1856 than in 1896.

Then, again, listen to this statement. There is a bank in the town of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS], the town of Lancaster, Pa. It has a capital of $200,000. All its capital is invested in bonds, to take out circulation. But let us see how it works. When you take that $200,000 in capital anywhere where you want to establish a bank, you find this: Our bonds sold to pay only 2.45 per cent interest for the eight years previous to the panic of 1893. Their normal price is 130 to pay 2.5 of income on their price, which is more than 3 per cent more than they averaged to pay in the eight years previous to 1893. You have, on the bonds that you get at 130, bonds amounting to $153,846.16. If you get currency up to par, what have you? You must put up 5 per cent for the redemption fund, or $7,692.31. That leaves you a possible loanable fund of only $146,153.85. You have reduced your loanable capital by 26.92 per cent from what you had when you began. And, furthermore, you can not loan a dollar to anyone unless he wants the bank bills. You have taken every dollar of your money and put it into bank bills; and if your customer can not use bank bills, but wants a check or a draft on New York, you can not loan him one cent until you send your bills to New York.

Again, when you have that money in your vaults, and it is not in circulation, you lose about 6 per cent, but in case you succeed in getting the money into circulation you get full interest on it, while out. In the country districts of New England, under the Suffolk system of current redemption, a system they had all over that country, they provide for current redemption in a big commercial city, Boston. They issued 100 per cent in currency in Vermont, equal to their capital, and made their loans and discounts at one-half of what they could make them had they not issued currency freely. In Virginia the banks had in circulation 96 per cent of currency to their capital.

Now, under the Suffolk system, what would be the result in aggregating $200,000 capital? You would have your capital and also currency to the amount of $200,000 if you could keep it in circulation. By keeping it at par with coin, as we did in New England, you would have, after setting aside 5 per cent for a current redemption fund, $390,000 possible loanable funds. The currency of the banks was as large as their capital in many cases, and they were thus able to make their loans and discounts at one-half of what they could without their currency, $390,000, under a rational and customary system, while issuing it to the par of the bonds, you can loan but $146,000, about three-eighths as much.

Raising $20,000 for a bank, they would only get of loanable funds $14,615.38, while under my bill their possible loanable funds would be $39,000.

Do you want to perpetuate this system? Can any political party afford to do so? It is believed all over this country that the bankers bought the $262,000,000 of bonds of this Government at 111.84 when its credit was destroyed, and by the very action of the bankers themselves. Of course I do not believe it, but that is the popular belief. They bought these bonds at 111.84, when their normal price in prosperous times was 127.44. The people thus lost $41,000,000. Those bonds have gone up, so the bankers have pocketed $16,000,000, and the popular belief is that they now want this bill passed so as to make the price of those bonds go up, so they can pocket the other $25,000,000. If that is the popular belief, does this House want to give these people any more specious evidence that it is true? I tell you, gentlemen, that the vote of this country very largely hangs on the vote on this measure, which ought to have passed years ago, but which, passed to-day, is giving a stone for bread and a scorpion for a fish; and it will be so regarded by large masses of honest people all over the country. Look at the situation a moment. Repeal your tax, allow the banks to issue circulation to the par of the bonds, with bonds at a nominal price of 130. What are the facts? In New York and Boston and other 4 per cent localities the profit to banks on currency will be 44 per cent more than in a 6 per cent locality, when it should be 50 per cent more in the 6 per cent locality.

Do you want to perpetuate such a system? How long must the people of the Northwest, of the South, and of all our agricultural regions, where money is 6 and 8 and 10 per cent, be compelled to go to New York to get their money? When our bonds sold to pay an income of 2.45 per cent in 1890, the New York City banks had $3,500,000 in currency. On October 2, 1893, when the bonds paid 3¾ per cent income on their price, New York City banks run their currency up to $15,800,000. Do you want to vote for this bill to aggravate and perpetuate such a system? Nay, verily. Only mischief to our country lurks in it. In a 4 per cent locality the profit is 174.4 per cent more than in an 8 per cent locality, when it should be 100 per cent more in the 8 per cent locality. In New York City, rating it a 4 per cent locality, the profit is 6555.5 per cent more than in a 10 per cent locality, when every man knows that in a 10 per cent locality the profit ought to be 150 per cent more than in a 4 per cent locality.

Do we propose to vote for this bill in the light of these facts and go to the country on our record? I want to say to this House that the evidence before our committee is conclusive that the people do not want cheap money. They want their natural rights on this money question. If they can be allowed to issue money freely, as they are allowed to do in every other country excepting this, and as our people did under the old State-bank system, the evidence is that you will hear nothing more of the greenback question or of the free-silver question. They are willing to accept any reasonable conditions for making good money. The people are taking these things as weapons to fight the bankers of this country, as they misunderstand the matter, and this bill, if passed, will seem to justify the opinions that have been instilled into their minds for years.

Now, let me give you a few more figures. In 1856 the loans to capital and deposits in the State of New York, outside of the city, was 116.5 per cent. To-day it is only 77.6 per cent. In New York City it was only 87.8 per cent. To-day it is 96.9 per cent. New York City has to-day 10 per cent more loans than she had in 1856 to her capital and deposits, while the State of New York, outside of the city, has 50 per cent less to-day than in 1856. Thus our banking and currency system works against the farming sections. Is it not perfectly evident to this House that, the loans and discounts of those country banks being so much less than they were formerly to the same amount of funds, the country people are paying about one-third more interest than they would have to pay if they could issue currency as under the old Suffolk system, which system was just as safe in every respect as the existing system, and that they are now seriously suffering?

I tell you Republicans that if you do not act with the greatest wisdom and promptness on this currency question you will not have as many Republicans in the Fifty-sixth Congress as there are Democrats in this Congress. We are proceeding in the wrong direction in this bill. We ought to amend our national banking law, and that at once, so as to permit the national banks to issue currency naturally, as was done under the old New England Suffolk system, under the Scotch system, the Canadian, and all others excepting ours, and under the State-bank system all over this country. The currency issued by those banks was not safe because there was no provision for current redemption in a large adjacent commercial city. In Virginia they had twice as much coin to their currency as there was in New England. Thirteen and one-half per cent was what we had in New England, and yet our bills sold at a premium everywhere and our bank failures were practically unknown; while in Virginia, for the reason that they did not provide for currency redemption in Baltimore, as over their own counters, their bills and those of all the other States except Louisiana sold at a discount. This simple contrivance makes the difference between money at par and at a discount. Now, nobody doubts that this bill ought to have passed long ago, but we are asked to do this thing at the wrong time, and therefore it ought not to be passed now.

I have not time to go any further into that question, but now let me ask your attention to some figures in this table:

Louisiana	997,233	2,196,563.50	13,753,600

Virginia to-day is robbed, practically robbed, of $12,000,000 of working capital that she would have under a rational banking system. And the same is true of all the other States—the agricultural States particularly. The large cities are relatively profited by the present national bond system of issuing currency, but in every other place it is a blighting curse.

Ah, but you tell me the trouble is they have no capital in the agricultural sections. That can not be the trouble, for they have more capital per capita in every State of this Union than they had in 1856, the year these figures were made for. There are no inducements for persons having capital to put their capital into banking in those sections. They do not do it because it will not pay them unless they can issue currency freely. They can do better by investing their money in the large centers, losing the advantage which they would have if they could put their capital into banking and issue bills upon it and have every dollar give additional dollars to loan. This has become such a terrible oppression that you can not find currency in circulation in many portions of the agricultural sections of the country.

Now, in seven States of the Northwest—California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington—the loans and discounts, as compared with capital and deposits—which are the funds of the banks—are only 52 per cent, while in 1856 the proportion in Massachusetts was 125 per cent. Just think of it a moment, 125 per cent of loans and discounts, as compared with capital and deposits, while now in the seven States that I have named the percentage is only 52.5. If those States had grown up under the Suffolk system—under a rational and universal system of banking and currency, such as exists in every country of the world except this—they would be loaning 125 per cent, and loaning it for one-third to one-half less than the rates at which they are now loaning their money, while at the same time they would be paying as large dividends on their banking stock as they are paying to-day.

Again, the present system compels our banks to be bond speculators. Why, sir, in 1881, when our bonds were paying 3 per cent on their purchase price, there was $312,000,000 of bank money in circulation. In 1890, when those bonds paid only 2.45 per cent, the money in circulation was reduced to $126,000,000. That is to say, when we want least money, the banks issue the most; when we want most money, they issue least. Our present banking system makes the currency of this country a "freak" currency, not issued with any regard to demand and supply, but issued wholly with reference to the profits of the banker.

Now, the remedy for these evils is to reform our banking and currency system. Let us save all we have in the national banking system that is valuable. Let us make each bank redeem its notes, every one of them, at some great commercial center which they themselves may elect, under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency, and keep every dollar of it at par with the most valuable coin. Allow them to issue their notes against their assets, up to their capital, just as they do in every other country and as they did in this country before the adoption of the national banking system. Let us have the supervision that we now have over them. If the bills of any bank come in for current redemption too frequently, it will be in order for the Comptroller of the Currency to notify such bank that it must not issue so many notes. The aggregate notes of all the New England banks were redeemed, on an average, five times a year—some of them not more than three times, some of them not more than once, some of them a dozen times.

In a city they can not issue currency under a free banking or a free currency system, because the currency is cleared at the clearing house as checks and drafts are and does not stay out long enough to make it an object for them to issue it. Under a rational banking system those sections of the country that need the most currency issue the most and get the profits on it and the people low rates of interest. The prices of loans and discounts are thus reduced, and they get their money as cheaply, or nearly so, as business men in New York.

It is a fact within my personal knowledge that the country banks throughout New England loaned their money on the whole and on the general average as low as it was borrowed in the city of Boston in 1856. Under a national banking system, loans and discounts in this country would, within ten years after our adoption of such a system, be scarcely higher in one part of the country than another, except as affected by the security given. To-day, although the security is equal, loans and discounts are in some parts of the country double what they are in others.

Mr. Speaker, I want the House to vote on this question intelligently. I want members to understand what they are doing. I do not want this House to advertise to the country that it is legislating in the interest of the bankers only when it is not so doing. Let me say to this House that there is no instance in history of any coinage system or any banking system of any country having been corrected or reformed upon the solicitation or with the approval of the bankers of that country. The very qualities that make men safe bankers—the very elements of character that make the Americans such splendid bankers, patriotic, and in every way as honorable, as any class of men in the community—are the elements of prudence, conservatism, and caution which lead them to fight, and fight to the death, anything that will touch existing conditions. Therefore this House must legislate outside of and adverse to the advice or approval of the bankers.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes; or to anybody else.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I wish to ask a question for information. I ask the gentleman whether there is anything that occurs to him as objectionable in this bill in permitting an increased issue of currency on the deposit of bonds?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes; there is a most decided objection. The great trouble in this country to-day—the source of the anxieties and panics that prevail from time to time—is the plan of making the Treasury responsible for the current redemption of the whole of this thousand million of currency. This system was only made endurable up to 1893 by this great Government being a part of the clearing-house system in New York, being a member, practically, of the New York clearing house. That required the keeping of nearly $300,000,000 in our Treasury, in order to make the people and the banks feel secure in the action of the Government, and the people were taxed for the interest on that sum.

Pass this bill and immediately $23,000,000 more will be added to the sum of money troubling the United States Treasury. Furthermore, the bonds that are now in existence will be sent into the banks, and from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 will be added to still further perplex the Treasury of this country, and to cause still more anxiety, and to cause still more panics, to throw men out of employment and make still more trouble. It will aggravate the situation.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me one further question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. In your judgment, then, will the passage of this bill increase the national-bank circulation in the United States?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I have no question about its increasing very much the national banking circulation in the United States, but I do not believe it will reduce the price of loans and discounts by the smallest farthing, but I do believe it will still further congest money in New York; in fact, all the money except the bank currency. The bank money is currently redeemed. If the New York bankers, or any other bankers, get any of this national circulation, it will be sent to Washington to be redeemed, and go back to the bank that issues it. The banks, therefore, will send all of their silver certificates, Treasury notes, legal-tender notes, and everything else to New York. The result now is that there is kept in New York from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000 of surplus money that the people can not borrow. This bill will still further increase it, and continue to limit the country districts in money accommodations.

One word more. You understand that if we have banks all over the country, situated as they were before the war, in every large town, the banker knows the men in that town and whether they are good for a loan or not, and these countrymen can borrow money in their own town; but get 100 miles away from them and the banker does not know the people who desire to give their notes in borrowing money, and therefore he will not dare loan the money. This national banking system amounts practically to a prohibition to the farming interests of some sections of this country as to borrowing money. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects to the bond security under the national banking system because it locks up an unnecessary amount of money, and would therefore favor some other method. Why does the gentleman oppose an amendment looking to a release of part of the money that is locked up? Is not his objection rather against the whole system, and not against this particular measure?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. My fundamental objection is against this needless, extravagant, oppressive system, and I object to this bill because it will not release one dollar of money, practically, for the people. That is to say, every dollar of this money that goes into general circulation will come back here to be redeemed and go into the banks that issue it, and throw out of those banks the silver certificates, the Treasury notes, and the legal-tender notes that they now have, which will drift to New York, so that the parts of this country that need the loans and discounts will not be helped by the smallest farthing. Those sections can not afford to buy bonds and take out currency, as I have proved.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Are you not opposed to the entire national banking system?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I say that it is impossible to-day to repeal the 10 per cent tax on State banks, because when we allow any notes to be issued by any banks we ought to provide for the banks keeping those notes at a par with all the money that we now have; and if we allowed State banks to issue their currency, we could make no provision, unless the National Government assumed it, for keeping their notes at a par with our coin, whether silver or gold. Therefore we are obliged to keep the 10 per cent tax on State-bank currency, and I believe that the national system, framed on the Suffolk plan as to currency, is better than the State-bank system.

Now, I want to say this—and I know I am going to be misrepresented in the newspapers, as I always am, about it. If we had no greenbacks, no Treasury notes, no silver certificates, and if we could not amend our national banking system, this House ought, within twenty-four hours, to repeal that 10 per cent tax on State-bank currency and give the people a chance to have cheap money, and they soon would make it good money.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will you please answer my question? Are you not opposed to the whole national banking system?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No, sir; I am not. I am in favor of a national banking system and of providing for the issuing of currency notes against the assets of the banks up to the amount of their capital, and I know they can do so safely by the Suffolk system of redemption. I am in favor of abolishing the bond security and the present method of issuing currency, and of allowing banks to issue notes up to the par of their capital, and requiring them to keep all that paper money at par with the best coin money we have. That is what I am in favor of.

Mr. OTJEN. Will you explain what you mean by the Suffolk banking system?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Let me tell you what that system was. The State of Massachusetts required the banks to keep a certain percentage of coin to their deposit and currency. They might issue all the notes that they would redeem over their own counters at par, up to the amount of their capital. But the Boston banks got together and determined that they would not accept any country-bank paper money in payment of any notes in their banks unless the banks would redeem their paper money at some bank in Boston, as well as over their own counters. That compelled the country banks, in order to circulate their money, to redeem it at some Boston bank. That was early in the thirties. The Boston banks again got together and agreed that the Suffolk Bank should do all this redemption of the currency of the country banks, and that forced the country banks to redeem their currency at the Suffolk Bank. The country banks fought this at first, but they soon saw it was for their advantage. The result was that they could keep their currency in circulation to a larger amount by this system. Every bank in the six New England States voluntarily came into the system.

The result was that on only 13.5 per cent of gold the New England currency sold all over this country at a premium. That of the Virginia banks sold at a discount because Virginia banks did not provide that their bills should be redeemed in Baltimore or New York; on 24 per cent of gold to currency their bills sold at a discount. Just that simple provision that they should be redeemed in some large commercial city caused that difference. Now, I have a bill before our committee that I would be pleased to have passed. It is the Suffolk system pure and simple, only providing that the banks shall take up pro rata our greenbacks—legal-tender notes—and currently redeem them, instead of the Treasury; and then the whole question is solved and money may be issued as freely as under any State system that has ever existed in this country and be absolutely good money.

Mr. COX. I desire to call the gentleman's attention a moment to a question, and that is, if in his bill, in talking about a system of banks——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I move to amend the bill under consideration by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the bill I send to the desk.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That can not be done.

Mr. COX. I will ask you if you authorize the banks to take out circulation to the par value of the bonds, and you let the tax remain on this circulation just as it is?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Not at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has this bill of which the gentleman speaks been reported?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No; and never will be until the Republicans are in earnest about reforming our financial and currency system.

Mr. COX. Do not you work in this way: A man can take out dollar for dollar to the par value of his bonds; he then goes to his community and lends that dollar for 8 per cent, and then draws 4 per cent upon the bonds?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The gentleman may put that in his speech. I do not accept that at all. I am not going into that bond question at all. I provide no use of bonds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BENNETT). The bill sent to the desk by the gentleman from Massachusetts will be read for information.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I hope it will not be read in my time. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD with the notes on the side and the footnotes so that the House may see what its provisions are.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What the gentleman asks can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my speech.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. You do not move it as an amendment?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I withdraw that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD as a part of his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill is as follows:

A BILL TO SECURE TO THE PEOPLE THE ADVANTAGES ACCRUING FROM THE ISSUE OF CIRCULATING PROMISSORY NOTES BY BANKS, TO INCREASE THE VOLUME OF SUCH NOTES, AND TO SUPERVISE AND CONTROL BANKS BY OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Banks to organize under existing law except as modified.

Amount of legal tender notes limited.

When such funds shall amount to 1 per cent of the total amount of greenbacks taken out under section 6 and section 8 of this act by banking associations and then held by them, or oftener, he shall call in, redeem, and cancel such notes so held that are in excess of the total amount of such notes issued to banking associations and held by them, previous to the setting aside of gold, as described in section 13 of this act. He shall first reduce the amount of such greenbacks to those associations which hold the largest amount of greenbacks in proportion to their capital, until the holdings of such greenbacks by all associations has been reduced to the sum required to be taken out by them in section 5 of this act. Thereafter the taking out and the holdings of greenbacks by all banking associations, as prescribed in section 5 of this act, shall be reduced so as to keep the total amount of greenbacks held by all banking associations as near as may be at the amount so held at the time of the setting aside of gold, as provided in section 13.

Balance of gold free money in two years.

* These "reserve notes" are not "reserve certificates." They are in no sense "issued against the reserve held." They hold exactly the same relation to the "reserve held" as any other liability of the banks. For each $95 of old issue of greenbacks that are redeemed and destroyed $100 of new greenbacks are issued and $100 of reserve notes, making $200 of currency for each $95 retired.

to relieve the situation. Thus, when the banks have assumed the current redemption of only $200,000,000 of legal-tender notes, the Treasury will be wholly relieved from paying gold on any form of paper money, and it will be a matter of as much indifference what the Government pays out as in the case of any private citizen.

One-fifth of one per cent safety fund tax.

SEC. 41. That in addition to all other taxes or duties provided for in this act each association organized under it shall pay into the Treasury of the United States a tax as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time prescribe equivalent to not less than one-fifth or more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum* in each year on the average amount of reserve notes issued under section 10 of this act and in circulation for the purpose of anticipating the redemption and destruction, in certain cases, of the reserve notes issued to associations under section 10 of this act: Provided, however, That such tax shall not be levied to exceed one-fifth of 1 per cent per annum at a time when the total amount of all *Four-fifths of the present paper-money circulation would be $300,000,000; one-fifth of 1 per cent per annum on the reserve notes, $300,000,000, would yield $1,200,000 per annum. The losses on the circulation to the United States Treasury on notes of insolvent banks, as shown by thirty years' experience under the existing banking laws, could not by any possiblity have been over $1,000,000 during the whole thirty-three years of the existence of the national banking system, had the national banks issued their notes under the provisions of this bill. Were the banks reorganized under this bill with $300,000,000 of circulation, the income to the United States from this one-fifth per cent tax would be $200,000 more each year than the total losses for the whole thirty-three years. The Government estimate for the bills lost and worn out past redemption, and to the advantage of the United States Treasury, is two-fifths of 1 per cent per annum on all circulation. Excluding the one-dollar and two-dollar bills, the loss might not be more than one-half, and the gain to the United States at one-fifth of 1 per cent on the $300,000,000 would be $1,000,000, which, added to the gain (over the losses) of the tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent would make the income to the United States Treasury about $2,000,000 per annum under this bill.

For the last five years the 1 per cent tax now collected on circulation has averaged $1,582,443. The banks are now in effect carrying without interest every dollar of the $1,000,000,000 paper money in circulation. Under this bill they would still carry one-fourth without interest and would get interest on the other three-fourths equal to the average rates on all loans and discounts made in all the country. This sum is estimated at from $36,000,000 to $50,000,000 per annum, ultimately making that much saving per annum in lower rates of interest on the loans made to the people. Besides these items, James S. McCoy, Government actuary, estimates the loss to the people in interest on the gold carried in the United States Treasury from 1879 to 1895 at $144,241,556. It will be more, rather than less, in the next twenty-five years under the present system.

moneys paid into the Treasury under this section exceeds by $2,000,000 the total net amount paid out of the Treasury under the provisions of section 34 of this act.

All money received to be a miscellaneous receipt.

Daily condition of bank to be recorded.

SEC. 43. That the Comptroller may at all times know the condition of each national banking association, however organized, each national banking association shall make such record at the close of each day as the Comptroller shall request, in a book kept for that purpose, which record shall show the total amount of its reserve notes paid out and in circulation, and the amount of such notes received from redemption agents, and its total deposit account, and its total reserve account, as shown by its books at the close of each business day, and of what the reserve consisted, which daily record of deposits, reserve, and reserve notes, and other matter requested by the Comptroller, shall be made up in duplicate for each month, and two copies or reports thereof transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency on or before the 10th day of the following month.

Comptroller may request additional report.

SEC. 44. That the duty upon the averages of the kinds of money which made up the reserve during each month, and all taxes and duties imposed by this act shall be due and payable semiannually on the 1st day of April and the 1st day of October in each year. Any clearing-house association, when requested so to do by any banking association, may assume and may pay any duty or tax imposed on such association by this act.

SEC. 47. That before making the record for the day, as provided in section 43, or required by the Comptroller, every transaction of that day pertaining thereto shall be duly entered in the books of the association.

SEC. 48. That from and after the thirty days mentioned in section 36 not less than 50 per cent of the cash reserve required by law to be kept by banking associations shall be in gold coin and gold bars of the United States and 50 per cent may be in silver coin and in greenbacks issued to other banks.

SEC. 49. That each banking association may keep its coin and bonds in such places and under such circumstances as the Comptroller of the Currency may approve.

SEC. 50. That any national banking association that fails to keep, use, and pay out its silver coin, and gold coin, and currency notes issued under section 6 and section 10 so as to keep all three kinds of money at a parity each with all the others from and after the setting aside of gold described in section 13 shall be deemed to have failed to pay in coin or coin certificates on demand the greenbacks and reserve notes or other notes signed and issued by its officers, as provided in section 39.*

That any clearing-house association organized under this act may deliver to the Treasurer of the United States, or to any assistant treasurer of the United States, for safe-keeping, any kind of money or bonds, and receive such a statement of the fact of their being in the Treasury of the United States as the Secretary of the Treasury may approve.

Treasurer of the United States may keep money and bonds for clearing houses.

SEC. 67. That any banking association may withdraw from any clearing-house association and any clearing-house association may withdraw from the national clearing-house association upon such conditions as the Comptroller of the Currency may approve.

Banks may withdraw from clearing house, and clearing-house association may withdraw from the national clearing house.

SEC. 68. That the capital of each banking association shall at all times be held to be, and shall be, the sum of its nominal capital plus its surplus and undivided profits, as shown by the last published annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency; and each share of its nominal capital stock shall be held to be a certificate of ownership to the person owning it of so much of the total actual capital of the association as herein described as the nominal value of the share bears to its total nominal capital; but no solvent association shall be required to make up or to keep its capital at a sum greater than the sum of its nominal capital.

Capital is capital, surplus, and undivided profits.

SEC. 69. That a duty equal in amount to one-fifth of 1 per cent per annum be, and is hereby, imposed on the average amount of the individual deposits that are subject to payment by check or draft or like instrument, whether payable on demand or at some future time, in each incorporated banking association, trust company, insurance company, loan association, or other corporation doing a deposit and loan and discount business, by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; when any part of the obligations bought or received or sold or issued by it is used in whole or in part in commerce among the several States: (1) Provided, That in case any association pays one-half the tax herein imposed on the day it is due and payable, the other half shall be and is hereby remitted: (2) And provided further, That any association is hereby authorized to deposit in the Treasury of the United States an amount of lawful money equal to not less than 12 per cent of the amount of its capital, as capital is defined in section 68 of this act, and receive legal-tender notes of the United States to the amount of such deposit.

Conditional tax on deposit in all deposit and discount banks.

Half of tax remitted, etc.

May secure legal-tender note circulation.

Such notes issued to it shall have a currency note of such association printed on the reverse side, which note, when the note of the association printed on the reverse side is signed by the proper officers of the association, may be paid out by it, but under the same restrictions as are imposed upon associations on such notes when issued to national associations under sections 6, 13, 39, and 50 of this act, excepting that the securing such notes by any association other than those organized under this act shall confer no authority to issue any other currency notes. In case any association takes out notes, as provided in this section and named greenbacks in this act, the tax imposed in this section shall be wholly remitted; but in case such notes are taken out and such tax is remitted, such association shall keep such record and make such reports to the Comptroller of the Currency and submit to such examinations by national-bank examiners as are now or may hereafter be required of national banks. All associations subject to this section shall also be subject to section 16 of this act. This section shall take effect on the first day of the first calendar quarter next succeeding the four months next succeeding the day of approval of this act.

Tax wholly remitted in a certain case.

SEC. 70. That in case of the taking possession of all assets of an association by the Comptroller of the Currency, as authorized and described in section 32 of this act, the assessment of all stockholders shall only be made in case such assessment is necessary to make up the fund mentioned in section 32 equal in amount to the currency notes mentioned in section 32, in which case the full assessment shall be made.

Act not to affect existing associations, except.

Mr. HILL. I want to ask the gentleman—if the national banking system is to remain as it is, the system of the country—if this 10 per cent increase in circulation to those having bonds deposited amounting to $23,000,000, would not that be beneficial to the country banks rather than to the larger banks of our reserve cities?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Not at all; because the country banks can not afford to buy bonds at their price and issue any currency, as I have proved by figures of the actuary of the Treasury.

Mr. HILL. That is not the question I ask.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That is the question I answered. I do not want an argument. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Let me repeat again that just as sure as you pass this bill you will have from fifty to a hundred millions of additional currency to perplex the Treasury and to assist to cause panic, pass whatever tariff bill you choose.

Mr. HILL. May I ask the gentleman if the banks can not furnish their own redemption fund?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I can not yield further to the gentleman. I am willing to yield to any gentleman who has not asked a question. I want to elucidate this subject and not to take advantage of anybody.

Mr. BOATNER. Then I will ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BOATNER. I quite agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Oh, do not make a speech. Please ask your question. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman yields to me, he will have to yield to me to put the question in my own way.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I yield for a question only.

Mr. BOATNER. Well, my question is whether the gentleman has any hope of substituting the banking system which he advocates for the one which we now have? [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I have no more doubt, Mr. Speaker, that it will be substituted for the existing system than I have of my own existence, for there is no other path to reform; but whether it will be done by this House, or by the next, or whether we are to have three or four Congresses elected and are to go through still more trouble and agony before it is done I do not know. But I do say to this House that if the Republicans soon coming into power do not adopt this, or its equivalent, there will be no more Republicans in the next House than there are Democrats in this one, and the next Presidential election will go against them. Their Presidential votes in 1900 will not be as many as Scott had in 1852. [Laughter.]

I tell you now, gentlemen, that you know and are acting on only the opinion of the bankers. You pay no regard to the South and the West and the masses of plain people of this land. The people of those sections have been begging and pleading for twenty years that you correct this banking system, but you have laughed them to scorn. You have not listened to their arguments or entreaties. You have not listened to their statements, even. If we make such a tariff as we ought to have, with duties as low as possible without cutting down American wages, and give the people freedom of banking in currency, the same as they had before the war, there will be no reason for putting Republicans out of power. But if we do not do these things, there will be every reason for putting us out of power in 1900. Give us merely the tariff you propose, and the sections of the country that are now most prosperous will continue to prosper more and more, but the sections that are not prosperous now will not be materially helped by it alone.

I am speaking to you the words of truth and soberness. [Laughter.] You little know, gentlemen, the burden to the merchants and the manufacturers of their interest account. It is the most onerous account they have. No other one compares with it. Reduce their interest account. Encourage manufacturers, especially in the South and Northwest, and they will find profits where they now find losses. You will have lower prices for goods everywhere. I have already told you how much cheaper.

Mr. THURSTON has given a signed interview, as by authority, which reads in part as follows:

> I feel that all proposed financial legislation can and ought to be postponed until this country has a chance to test the effect of the new protective tariff. We are not therefore very much interested about any money issue.

No; then the Republicans are not very much interested about continuing to hold this Government. The Republicans had no right to make a contest to get possession of this Government if they did not propose to so legislate and so act as to keep it. The Democrats had no right to make a contest to get this Government in 1892 if they did not propose to so legislate and so act as to keep the Government. Such a contest between parties is an honorable contest between honorable men; otherwise nay.

Again, what does Mr. SHERMAN say in articles written for a magazine and elsewhere? Mr. SHERMAN, in a speech in the Senate of the United States, said:

> There is scarcely a doubt but that in all contingencies of trade or finance, except the contingency of war, the whole mass of United States Treasury notes now in circulation can be maintained at par with coin.

Aha! "Except the contingency of war." War! We had a message sent to this House a short time ago involving the contingency of war, and millions and billions did the value of property shrink in our country in an hour, and all because of our rotten financial system, when, had a like message been sent to the British Parliament, or to the German or the French Chamber, it would not have caused a ripple in the business of those countries. Nay, it would have helped it by creating a demand for the war materials required.

But this was not enough. The same gentleman wrote an article in the April Forum on "Deficiency of revenue the cause of our financial ills," and on page 144 of that magazine he says:

> There is scarcely a doubt but that in all conditions of trade or finance, except in the contingency of war, the whole mass of United States notes and Treasury notes now in circulation can be maintained at par with coin.

Yes, and this when we have taxed our people $500,000,000 in the last ten years to keep our Army. We have taxed them half as much or more to build a navy; and the sinews of war, viz, sound bankers' credit, would be destroyed in the twinkling of an eye, according to the supposed highest authority in this country. Pass this bill and you give the people a stone when they ask for bread, a scorpion for a fish! Nay, verily, I beg and plead with this House to vote this bill down and give the people instead what they ask for, which will make banking first many fold more profitable to the banks, and thus cause new banks to start up, which will soon cut down rates of interest and furnish cheaper money for the people. This will stimultate trade and enterprise, especially in the outlying country localities. If you want to build up New York, if you want to build up Chicago, if you want to build up Richmond, if you want to build up Savannah, if you want to build up Birmingham, if you want to build up any of your cities, aim first to build up the country, and the country, and a prosperous country only, will build up the cities.

But gentlemen say: "Wait! Wait! Wait! England reformed her currency in 1695, when she was in a fierce struggle with France, her old antagonist, and had on her hands, in addition, a war with Holland." It will not do to wait, gentlemen. The people have been calling on us for twenty years to reform this currency system. Reform it now! [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I agreed to yield ten minutes of my time (if I have any remaining) to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I raise the question whether the hour accorded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] was not granted as a personal courtesy to him, and whether he can surrender any part of the time to anybody else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts yields to me ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] raises the question whether the hour granted to the gentleman from Massachusetts was not granted to him personally. But if the House has no objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COX. The time to be occupied by the gentleman from Mississippi will come out of the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. It comes out of the time of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, as my position with reference to this bill is somewhat peculiar, I wish an opportunity to explain it. With an amendment which I shall read, and which I shall ask unanimous consent of the House later to offer, I am willing to support this bill. Without it, I am unwilling to do so. Contrary to the opinion generally prevailing with disciples here of the school of politics to which I belong, I do not believe that the passage of this bill will have any bad effect upon the country, provided the amendment which I shall read be coupled with it.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen who agree with me in opposing the entire national banking system seem to think that the passage of a bill of this sort will fasten that system still more securely upon the country; and they go so far as to say that a vote for this bill would be an indorsement of the national banking system. I am opposed in toto to the present national banking system, and for some of the reasons stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], as well as for others frequently stated by me. I am also opposed in toto to a protective tariff. But I no more regard the support of an amendment which looks to perfecting the existing national banking system as an indorsement of that system than I would regard an amendment lessening the burdens of a tariff bill as an indorsement of protectionism. I no more regard it as an indorsement than I would regard the payment of a ransom to brigands, in order to purchase my release while held a captive by them, as an indorsement of brigandage.

I have no idea that the present bill can cure the great, the principal disease which is affecting this country—the disease of constantly and continuously falling prices. I think I know that nothing can cure that disease except an increase in the volume of the thing which measures prices, viz, real or coin or basic money, and therefore a decrease in its value, and therefore an increase in the price of other things as measured by it. But there is another disease which is hurting the country only less than that. It is the disease of the congestion of the circulating blood of the country in the head or in the heart, whichever you may call it—the congestion of the circulation in the great money centers. That congestion, Mr. Speaker, comes partially from the existence of the disease of falling prices, but not altogether. It comes partially from that cause, because wherever business is unprosperous and productive enterprise unprofitable men take to using their money in the loan market instead of using it in productive enterprise. Therefore money is congested about the money centers, where it can find most ready lenders. But there is another reason for it; and that other reason, in my opinion, is the difficulty of banking at a profit in the sparsely settled sections of the country under the present national banking system. This operates against the rural districts—against my people—and in favor of the commercial centers; to the upbuilding of speculative enterprises to the detriment and starvation of productive industries.

Now, although opposed in toto to the present national banking system, yet if I can get any amendment ingrafted upon the system whereby it will become more profitable to open banks where they are not now very profitable, or whereby it may become somewhat profitable to open them where they are not now profitable at all, as is the case in the greater portion of my section of the country, I think I ought to welcome such an opportunity to facilitate exchange and the planting and handling of crops. The system is here. Whether we can ever get rid of it or not is a question; but so long as it is here, it ought, in my opinion, to be made to do the work of the people. And although an increase of the circulation will not be an increase of the money of the country, and an increase of circulation without an increase of money can not cure the disease of falling prices, such an increase will have the effect of relieving other difficulties and evils under which the country labors, among them the one which I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. Speaker, I think this bill will ease the work of exchange to the tune of $22,000,000 at the very lowest, and will put the increased currency just where it is now needed, and will enable it to be brought out just when it may be needed, provided there is one little amendment inserted in it. I shall ask unanimous consent at the proper time to offer this amendment and to obtain a vote of the House upon it, and I hope there will be no objection to it on the part of the committee. It is as follows:

After the word "deposited," in line 11 of the bill, insert:
"And no national banking association shall pay taxes on an amount of circulation less than 75 per cent of the circulating notes which they are entitled to issue under this act."

Without that amendment this bill is nothing, an emasculated, purposeless thing, a mere sop thrown out to make the people think you are doing something, because just as long as it is to the interest of the national banks not to issue 90 per cent it is true that it is a little bit less against their interest not to issue 100 per cent, but it will not make much to their interest to issue it, and to keep it out, and in my opinion they will not do it.

Nor would I, if I could, force them to keep their circulating notes out all the time; but I want in this bill to furnish them with an inducement to increase the currency of the country; not its money, because a paper promise to pay a dollar is no more a dollar, whether it is the promise of a bank or a promise of the Government, than a paper promise to pay a horse is a horse, and it can have no more effect upon prices in the long run than promises to pay horses can have on the number of horses. But if we can get this, it will ease exchange, it will multiply business facilities and banking facilities in the section of the country where I live. When we have forced the banks to pay taxes upon at least 75 per cent, if they take out a charter, of the amount which they are entitled to issue, as my amendment does, then you may safely rest assured that they will keep afloat all of that 75 per cent, which they can keep afloat safely and consistently with business interest. Nor would I force them to do any more than that.

I wished to say these few words, Mr. Speaker, in order that my own position might be understood, both here and elsewhere. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] for yielding me the time, and especially thank him in view of the fact that earlier in the day I had objected to time being granted him by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] has yielded time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] and he has been recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as two gentlemen have spoken on the other side on this question, I supposed it would be proper for some one to be heard in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It would be proper, but the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill on the same ground that my friends from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] and from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] object to it, except that I go a little further. If this privilege of increasing the currency is extended to the banks and you do not require the currency to be taken out, it seems to me that we aggravate this situation. This bill continues a premium to the banks to call in their notes. It seems to me that we forget that national banks were originally organized not for the benefit of the bankers, primarily, but for the benefit of the people. This is a banker's measure, pure and simple. You will bear in mind that the theory of the banks of the Old World was to primarily aid the people, and our first bank followed this plan.

The directors of the Bank of England regarded it as their duty prior to 1810 to discount every solvent note that came to the bank. Up to 1810 that was regarded as the bounden duty of the bank. When any solvent note for a legitimate enterprise came to the bank, its directors believed that, as the Government agent, it was the duty of the bank to discount the note. If there was any indication of scarcity of money, the directors of the bank regarded it as their duty to liberally discount notes and relieve the pressure. But in 1810, as the historian tells us, Sir Robert Peel stood with the people, but after 1816 the same Sir Robert Peel went over to the side of the bankers, and from that time was the spokesman of Lombard street. The directors then said that they would not discount every note, but would leave it to the bank to say whether it would be to its interest to discount notes. The elder Peel, when he heard that his son had voted for that change, said: "My son Robert upon yesterday doubled his fortune, but ruined his country."

Now, what did we see during our late panic? I do not know what our friends in the great money centers saw, but there came to the State of Colorado and to every State in the West, probably, notices from the New York bankers insisting that every bank should draw in its loans and its circulation and insist upon the repeal of the Sherman Act. I carried two of those notices in my pocket, given me by the bankers of Colorado, and I want to say that before Senator SHERMAN introduced his bill for the repeal of the Sherman Act the banks all over the West were given notice that such a movement was going to be made, and asking them to begin the war.

Now, what I mean to say is that if you increase the circulation, and you make provision that the banks must issue the money and keep it in circulation, or that if they do not keep it in circulation they must keep it ready to circulate, then it will benefit the people. But if you do not do that, the very moment that the controlling portion of the banking population of this country concludes to coerce Congress again they will draw the circulation in and make another bankers' panic. They will return their circulation to the Comptroller, get the 1 per cent interest, and their bonds will go right along drawing interest. You are simply increasing their power for evil. No safe benefit can inure to the people through this bill unless you require the banks to issue the circulation and stop all interest on the bonds, so they may have no premium before them to call it in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I listened, as I always do, with a great deal of interest to what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], the distinguished chairmain of the Committee on Banking and Currency, when he had the floor. If it were proper for me to make any strictures upon his remarks, I should say that he was hardly germane in what he said to the bill now under consideration. There were some things said by him in the course of his argument to which I can not give my assent, but he also said much with respect to the defects in the present banking and currency system to which I most heartily subscribe.

The national banking system, Mr. Speaker, has given us a sound and uniform paper money. In this respect it has been a marked success. It has lamentably failed, however, to give us a flexible and elastic currency; that is, a currency possessing the capacity to expand and contract to meet the varying needs of business and of commerce. It is also true, as alleged by its opponents, that under this system the currency congests at the great financial centers, and the agricultural sections of the country, the South and the West, have not a proper supply of it; that they are compelled to go without currency when they require it to effect exchanges; that they have not a sufficient volume of it with which to carry on the exchanges of their everyday life or to prosecute any extraordinary enterprises which they undertake, unless they secure it at extraordinarily high rates of interest.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that there is a great awakening to this defect in our present currency system upon the part of many of the thinking and reflecting people of the country. They are disposed to recognize the evils as well as the benefits which flow from the system. When the time has come that a gentleman from Massachusetts, and one from Mississippi, and one from Indiana, can stand upon the floor of the House of Representatives and each frankly admit that there is something worthy to be considered in these grievances which are urged by the South and West, and unite in the opinion that there ought to be a remedy applied to the wrong as soon as possible, it certainly augurs well for the future of the country.

In my humble opinion, sir, the redress for these evils to which I refer is not to be found short of a complete revision of our entire banking and currency system. I sincerely hope it is true, as recently declared in a newspaper article, that the President-elect, immediately upon his accession to power, will send a special message to Congress recommending the establishment of a commission, to consist of members of the Senate and the House, to study and examine into the question of banking and currency reform, and formulate and present to Congress a bill to be acted upon by it at an early day. I earnestly trust, too, that a Committee on Banking and Currency is to be appointed at the special session of Congress, that it may take upon its shoulders this much-needed work of relieving all sections of the country, which suffer from a lack of a sufficient volume of good paper money.

You may pass a bill for the holding of an international bimetallic conference, if you please. The nations of the Old World will probably accept your invitation. They will treat you with profound respect. They will sit in the conference with complaisancy, listen to your arguments and very likely reply to them, and then they will politely bow themselves out, just as they have done on previous occasions, and leave you precisely where you were when you commenced. If you are going to give the people any financial relief; if you are going to destroy anything of the demand for a short-weight dollar and for all forms of dishonest paper currency, you must do it not through an international bimetallic conference, which is almost certain to be a failure, but by a general revision of your banking and currency laws, whereby you give them not simply a sound and uniform currency, but a currency sufficient in volume, well diffused throughout the country, and obtainable at all times at reasonable rates of interest.

But now with reference to the particular measure under discussion. It seems to me, sir, that the fundamental error with the gentleman from Massachusetts lies in the fact that because he can not obtain all he wants now, he is, therefore, unwilling to accept anything whatever. It strikes me that the position just taken in this debate by the gentleman from Mississippi is much more rational. If we can not have a new and perfect machine just now, let us patch as well as we can the old implement, for, when patched, it will do better work than if left in an imperfect state. There is no knowing how soon we may be able to accomplish a general reform. The gentleman from Massachusetts tells us that it may be three or four Congresses in the future. Let us, therefore, address ourselves as practical legislators to such amendments of the existing system as we can now secure, and which will have a tendency to remedy, at least to some degree, the admitted defects.

Mr. Speaker, when the national banking law was enacted our bonds were selling low, and it was therefore deemed dangerous to the note holders to permit the banks to issue circulating notes to the par value of the bonds. But a great change soon occurred. The national credit improved. The bonds greatly appreciated in value, until now they are not only at par but are at a considerable premium. There is no longer any danger in permitting the banks to issue to the par value of the bonds. If any depreciation should hereafter occur in these bonds, the bill under consideration provides an adequate remedy. It retains the provision of the existing law which requires the banks to immediately put up, in such an event, additional bonds to cover the margin of depreciation.

The bill, sir, has not been recommended simply by the banking interests of the country, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] seemed to imply. It has been recommended also by the commercial and business interests of the country. The principle it contains has the indorsement of every Secretary of the Treasury who has ever mentioned the subject. It has been indorsed by every Comptroller of the Currency who has held that office from the time the national banking system was established down to the present time. It has the approval of the present Secretary of the Treasury and of the present Comptroller of the Currency. Nor is any tax upon the people involved in the bill. Indeed, a benefit is to result to the people, since, in its practical operation, the bill will permit an increase in the circulating medium at those times when it is most needed to answer the demands of trade and commerce.

The bill confers no advantage upon the banks that is not also the advantage of the people; and I want to say right here, Mr. Speaker, that I disagree with the proposition that whatever benefits the banks must necessarily be to the injury of the people. The interest of the banks and the interest of the people are generally identical. At any rate such will be the case in this instance if this bill becomes a law, and additional circulating notes can be issued in time of need. Under the pending measure the national-bank circulation can, with the bonds now available for security, be increased upward of $30,000,000—quite an item in such a money stringency as we encountered in the panic of 1893.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The gentleman does not mean to intimate that I have stated that whatever benefits the banks must necessarily injure the people?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I did not understand the gentleman to lay this down as a general proposition, but he certainly argued that this proposed law was in the exclusive interest of the banks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been objected by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] that this bill does not make it imperative on the banks to take out circulation. The amendment offered by the amiable and able gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is nothing more nor less than another form of putting the objection of the gentleman from Tennessee. The trouble with their proposition is that it establishes a hard and fast line by which the volume of circulation is to be regulated. This is the great objection to the national banking system. Under the bond security, the circulation must necessarily be confined within certain prescribed limits. The national banking act also imposes certain limitations upon the taking out and the surrender of currency by the banks, and the effect of all this is to establish an arbitrary volume of currency, utterly regardless of the ever-varying needs of business, and to make elasticity in the money supply very difficult, if not impossible. Instead of being hampered by arbitrary regulations as to the amount of money to be placed in circulation, the bank should, in my opinion, be left free to issue and retire currency as the business interests of the community require, and for this reason the objection of the gentleman from Tennessee and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi ought not, in my judgment, to be considered by the House. But the gentleman from Tennessee says that the effect will be to appreciate the value of the bonds. That is purely conjecture, purely a matter of speculation. It is not at all likely that the bonds will increase in value to such an extent as to overcome the advantage of the increased circulation and render note issuing as unprofitable as it is at the present time.

It should not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is not the sole measure relating to national banks which is sought to be enacted by this Congress. Only a few days ago a bill authorizing the incorporation of national banks with a capital stock of $20,000 passed this House. Other remedial legislation is likely to be hereafter attempted. It is therefore the part of wisdom not to leave these matters entirely out of consideration in passing upon the merits and probable effects of the pending bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts claims that the passage of the bill will increase the drain upon the Treasury reserve; but this, sir, is not a proposition to issue more greenbacks or more United States Treasury notes, like those issued under the act of 1890. The drain could certainly not bear any such a relation to the Treasury as that produced by these kinds of paper.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX] desire to consume any more of his time?

Mr. COX. If no gentleman desires to occupy the time now in opposition to the bill, I will add a few words.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], who has just taken his seat, in seeking to answer the objection which I made to the bill that it should be made imperative on the banks to take out circulation, has not met that objection. I will go further and say that if you adopt a provision making it imperative on the banks to take out circulation, then I will vote to reduce the tax upon circulation. The proposition, then, resolves itself into this, and there is no escape from it: The argument of the gentleman from Indiana is that we should leave it to the discretion of the banks as to when they will take out circulation or when they will not. My argument is that if a bank can deposit a bond worth, we will say, $1.12 to every dollar of face value—a bond drawing 4 per cent interest, paid by the taxpayers of this country—and then if it can obtain upon that bond $1 of circulation for every dollar of face value, to be loaned out to the people throughout the country at 6, 8, 10, or 15 per cent, there can be, in my mind, no objection to compelling the bank holding such bonds to take out that circulation.

The country will then understand that there is a certain amount of banking circulation out, because it will be imperative upon the banks to take out that amount. Under such circumstances no sort of machinery can bring about a contraction of the currency through the concerted action of the large money centers against the smaller moneyed interests. The people will know what amount of circulation is outstanding. How it shall be used is a totally different question. That is a question which addresses itself to the sound discretion of every well-managed bank.

Gentlemen who disagree with me are willing to increase the power of the banks by permitting them to take out circulation to the extent of the par value of their bonds, while they would leave it discretionary with the banks whether to take out that currency or not. Gentlemen answer my proposition by saying that the banks should be left to decide when they need the circulation and when they do not need it. I say, with all respect to gentlemen holding different views, that under such an arrangement the question how much circulation there should be would be decided by the banks purely according to their own interest. That is the trouble.

If the banks are compelled to take out this circulation, they need not hold it in their vaults; the notes need not be signed; they may be left with the Secretary of the Treasury; but they will pay taxes on that amount of circulation. What, then, will be the interest of the banks? It will be to furnish the country with a proper circulating medium, as far as they can.

I repeat—and this is all I wish to say on the bill—if you leave it discretionary with the banks to take out circulation or not, the bill will accomplish nothing. In that case, whether the banks take out circulation or not will depend on the price of the bonds. If the bonds advanced in price, there would be no inducement for the banks to take out circulation that will yield them less money to bank upon than that which the bonds themselves would yield. What hardship is there upon the banks in such a proposition as I advocate? None in the world. If this Government gives to the banks the right to carry on a banking business—if it guarantees their notes and stands behind them and besides issues to them notes to the full amount of the par value of the bonds which they hold, while at the same time it pays them 4 per cent interest, or whatever the rate may be, upon those bonds—is it asking too much that the bank be required to take out the circulation to which it is entitled, and not permitted to contract or expand the circulation of the country at its pleasure?

The Government should hold the power to control the amount of circulation, and not the banks.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS].

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] who addressed the House a few moments ago, that the only stable and safe way to improve our currency is to do it by gentle stages—not by uprooting our present system or superseding it by a new and different one, but by correcting such defects as time and experience may reveal in the system.

Singularly enough, Mr. Speaker, there is a very remarkable confusion of tongues among us upon the subject of banking and currency—a confusion comparable only to the lingual curse of Babel. I think that in the Banking and Currency Committee—and I disclose none of its secrets—there are several members who have bills of their own that have been considered, and I think I may be permitted to say that upon all those bills, each one represented by a member, the committee probably—and I speak approximately—if they voted to-day, would stand about 16 to 1, there being 17 members on the committee.

Now, I think that the national banking system is the best banking system that the wit and wisdom of man ever devised. A great many of the criticisms that are made upon it are about as valuable as the criticism of Mr. Tooke years ago on the banking system of England, when he said that the Bank of England was one of the most wanton, ill-advised, pedantic, and rash pieces of legislation that had ever come within his observation.

That was the criticism of a great publicist on finance; yet nobody in England believed his criticism was warranted, and nobody paid any attention to it. Now, in spite of the great weight that should attach to anything said by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency because of his long and attentive study of this question, yet I think his strictures upon the banking system of this country are about as valuable as those of Mr. Tooke upon the banking system of England. Moreover, I think the complaints which are made of our national banking system have about as much in them, nine times out of ten, as the celebrated complaint of Sidney Smith in regard to the solar system, when he said to his friend Jeffries: "Damn the solar system! Bad light; planets too remote; pestered with comets—a feeble contrivance! I could make a better myself." [Laughter.]

Let me read what Justice Miller, the late lamented justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, said about our national banking system, and he expressed my view on the subject:

> It is a matter of interest which I can not forbear to mention here, that the present national banking system, in my judgment, and in that of many thinking men—statesmen and philosophers—is the best that the world has ever known.

I do not want any statesman to lay violent hands upon that system. It has got a deep taproot. I do not want it uprooted. I want it to be nurtured with care. I want amendments passed to improve it, when we are sure we know what we are doing. But when we are in doubt about that, I want us to keep our hands off. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am cordially in favor of this bill, because it will afford some relief where the need is most urgent. I would like to bring some relief to our brethren in the South and West. I know there is a difficulty about the currency in those sections, but I say that until by law you can equalize the material conditions, the resources, the capital, and the wealth of the different sections of our country, you can not equalize the benefits which banks afford. Legislation is unequal to such a task.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, believing that the public interest will be better served by coming to a vote now than by a continuation of this debate, I will yield back to the gentleman in charge of the bill the time that he assigned to me, and ask that a vote be taken now.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I ask for a vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before that vote takes place, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I read may be considered as pending, and may be voted upon by the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sorry that the gentleman objects, because some of us could vote for the bill if that amendment were allowed to come in.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 126, noes 37.

Accordingly, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. COX, and Mr. SULZER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 145, nays 45, not voting 165; as follows:

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of House bill 7320. It is a bill to prevent trespassing upon the national parks. The commissioners of the Gettysburg and Chattanooga parks are much troubled by trespassers of various sorts. There is an amendment to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 7320) to prevent trespassing upon and providing for the protection of national military parks; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out section 4 in the following words:

SEC. 4. That any person to whom land lying within any national parks may have been leased, who refuses to give up possession of the same to the United States after the termination of said lease, and after possession has been demanded for the United States by any park commissioner or the park superintendent, or any person retaining possession of land lying within the boundary of said park which he or she may have sold to the United States for park purposes and have received payment therefor, after possession of the same has been demanded for the United States by any park commissioner or the park superintendent, shall be guilty of trespass, and is liable to a penalty of not more than $1,000. And it shall be lawful for the park employees by force to eject such person from the land so held and from the park.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. WALTHALL were appointed.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As a part of the morning business, the Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution, coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. ALLEN, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President is requested to return to the Senate for further consideration the bill (H. R. 9647) to authorize the extension of the lines of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

PROPOSED EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from South Dakota permit me a moment? I ask unanimous consent that we may have an executive session at 3 o'clock this afternoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that there be an executive session at 3 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. FRYE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed.

Mr. HILL. I give notice, so that no one may be taken by surprise, that at 3 o'clock this afternoon I shall submit a motion for an executive session.

NONPARTISAN INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION.

Mr. QUAY. The Senate will remember that some days ago I called up what is known as the labor-commission bill. At that time there were serious objections to some of its features, but since then a compromise bill has been arranged between the opponents of the original bill and the committee representing the labor organizations, to which I think there will be no objection by any Senator on the floor. I should be glad if the Senate would now take up the bill and consider the compromise bill and send it to the other House.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what commission bill he refers to? I was unable to hear him.

Mr. QUAY. The labor-commission bill.

Mr. WHITE. I have no objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I demand the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from South Dakota to object?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understand that the regular order this morning after the routine morning business is the Indian appropriation bill, and I desire to proceed with it. I will yield to the Senator after the bill is laid before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Simply that the order of last evening be carried out, that after the routine morning business the Indian appropriation bill shall be taken up. Is the morning business closed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota demands the regular order. The Chair will state that the morning business having been disposed of, the regular business is the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understand that last evening unanimous consent was given to take up the Indian appropriation bill immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is true, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. With that statement, the Chair lays before the Senate the Indian appropriation bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 10002) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTIGREW. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska has addressed the Chair.

Mr. PETTIGREW. One moment. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a statement?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I will yield for a statement.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There are two committee amendments which, of course, will be the first to be considered. I desire to take up the one first on page 70 and dispose of the two committee amendments; and then the amendments offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be in order.

Mr. ALLEN. I have been trying to get in an objection here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator from Nebraska, but he yielded the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Last night I said I would object to taking up the Indian appropriation bill if it interfered in the slightest degree with the consideration of the Sanguily resolution.

Mr. STEWART. That does not come up until 1 o'clock.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; let it go over until that time.

Mr. STEWART. It is the unfinished business at 1 o'clock.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to proceed with the consideration of the amendment on page 70.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee has been read. The amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment of the committee will be read.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the Senator from South Dakota to yield to me in order that I may call up the bill which I mentioned a few moments ago.

Mr. PETTIGREW. With the understanding that it will lead to no debate, I will yield.

Mr. QUAY. If there is any debate or any objection, I will withdraw it.

Mr. HAWLEY. What is the bill?

Mr. QUAY. It is what is known as the labor-commission bill. I do not know whether the Senator from Connecticut, who, I believe, was rather hostile to the bill in its original form, is aware that a compromise bill has been arranged between the opponents of the bill and the committees of the labor organizations, which, I understand, is unobjectionable. I desire to call up the bill and substitute the compromise bill for the bill of the House, if there is no objection.

Mr. HALE. That is a very important matter. It will give rise to debate. I must object.

Mr. QUAY. I understand that there are no objections to it, and that is the reason why I have asked to take it up. I will adopt the suggestion of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], and ask that the substitute be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was unable to near whether objection was interposed by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I objected.

Mr. QUAY. Objection was interposed. I merely ask that the proposed substitute be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The Secretary read as follows:

Substitute for 9188.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a commission is hereby created, to be called the "industrial commission," to be composed as follows: Five members of the Senate, to be appointed by the presiding officer thereof; five members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and nine other persons who shall fairly represent the different industries and employments, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of this commission to investigate questions pertaining to immigration, to labor, to agriculture, to manufacturing, and to business, and to report to Congress and to suggest such legislation as it may deem best upon these subjects.

SEC. 3. That the commission shall give reasonable time for hearings, if deemed necessary, and if necessary it may appoint a subcommission or subcommissions of its own members to make investigation in any part of the United States, and it shall be allowed actual necessary expenses for the same. It shall have the authority to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths and affirmations. All necessary expenses, including clerks, stenographer, messengers, rent for place of meeting, and printing and stationery, shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; however, not to exceed $50,000 per annum for expenditures under this section.

SEC. 4. That it may report from time to time to the Congress of the United States, and shall at the conclusion of its labors submit a final report.

SEC. 5. That the term of the commission shall be two years. The salary of each member of this commission appointed by the President shall be $3,000 per annum and actual traveling expenses.

SEC. 6. That any vacancies occurring in the commission by reason of death, disability, or from any other cause, shall be filled by appointment of the President of the United States.

SEC. 7. That a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HALE. That is a gigantic scheme for building up a great set of officeholders at the rate of $5,000 a year. I object to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10002) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment of the committee, beginning on page 70, will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Interior," in line 8 on page 72, insert the words "unless such award has been paid to and accepted by the claimant;" so that when amended the clause will read:

And no right of either party shall be impaired by reason of any previous award or ruling made by the Secretary of the Interior, unless such award has been paid to and accepted by the claimant.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. This is a very important amendment. We have partly discussed it. It was called up last night, and there was not a sufficient number present to consider it properly. I shall have again to ask for a full Senate before considering it. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Cockrell,	Lodge,	Quay,
Allison,	Davis,	Mills,	Roach,
Bate,	Elkins,	Mitchell, Wis.	Sherman,
Berry,	Frye,	Morgan,	Shoup,
Blackburn,	Gear,	Morrill,	Stewart,
Blanchard,	Gorman,	Murphy,	Teller,
Brown,	Gray,	Nelson,	Tillman,
Burrows,	Hale,	Pasco,	Vest,
Call,	Hawley,	Peffer,	Vilas,
Cannon,	Hill,	Perkins,	Walthall,
Carter,	Hoar,	Pettigrew,	White.
Chandler,	Kenney,	Platt,
Chilton,	Lindsay,	Pugh,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BROWN. The object of the amendment, Mr. President, is simply to carry out the scheme proposed by the committee to submit the whole question, with all its equities, defenses, and points, to the Court of Claims. It is claimed here that many of these claimants presented their claims to the Secretary of the Interior and he has adjusted them; that they had accepted the allowance and been paid the amount, and that they are satisfied with it. This amendment simply proposes that the court shall take that fact, among others, into consideration, and give it such weight as the court sees fit. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be passed at this time.

Mr. BURROWS. It seems to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] ought to be accepted by the committee. If this matter is going to the Court of Claims there is no reason why they should not examine the full question and ascertain how much has been paid each one of the claimants, and not bar the Indians from making any proper defense of the claims.

I have very great doubt myself whether there is any great merit in the claims whatever. In fact, from a conversation had with officials who are familiar with it, I am satisfied that the claims are without foundation. I hold in my hand a report made by the Secretary of the Interior upon these claims, embracing also the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, from which it appears that out of this fund there have been paid to these attorneys in all the sum of nearly $200,000. It is true that did not exhaust the fund, and possibly that is the reason why these additional claims are filed, with a view of securing, if possible, from the Indians the remaining $80,000.

The Secretary of the Interior, in commenting on these claims, says, among other things:

It further appears that since the appropriation was made the following claims have been paid: September 6, 1894, to J. M. Bryan, 6½ per cent, $32,025.11; September 8, 1894, to William Wilson, 2 per cent, $16,007.72; September 8, 1894, to William H. Hendricks, 2 per cent, $16,007.72; total $84,040.55; that claims of attorneys for services were adjudicated by your office under section 2104 of the Revised Statutes and transmitted to the Department for its action, as follows: August 31, 1894, claim of Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot, 4 per cent, $32,015.45; September 5, 1894, claim of Garland & May, 1½ per cent, $15,060; total, $47,075.45.

These claims, as well as the claim of John T. Heard for $10,000, and of the Wilshire estate for $13,500, hereinafter referred to, have been approved by the Department by letter of January 5, 1895.

The Secretary of the Interior further says:

The claims of Messrs. Bryan, Hendricks & Wilson have been paid, and the claims of Messrs. Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot, Messrs. Garland & May, Mr. John T. Heard, and the Wilshire estate have been approved, as above stated, and now require no consideration.

The claim of John A. Sibbald.—

The Secretary says, speaking of this claim:

I do not think that Mr. Sibbald is entitled to anything more than one-fifth of the amount allowed on the Wilshire claim, in accordance with his agreement with Mr. Wilshire.

The claim of W. S. Peabody.—Upon this claim I am of opinion that Mr. Peabody's acceptance of employment under the Government of the United States can not be considered an abandonment of his contract. The proof filed shows that he performed very valuable services during a period of many years, extending from the year 1873 to the close of the case. I have carefully considered his claim, and I can not think that, however valuable and meritorious these services may have been, he is entitled to the enormous sum at which he rates them. I agree with you that the sum of $3,000 would be ample compensation for all the services rendered; and that sum is allowed.

And he was paid it.

The claim of E. J. Ellis.—The proof shows that this claim is of the most meritorious character. To be sure, the services of Mr. Ellis were not of long duration, for he died a few months after he was employed in the case. I do not think, under the circumstances, that the representatives of Mr. Ellis are entitled to a very considerable compensation for his services. I think, however, that the compensation suggested by you is quite inadequate. I am of opinion that the estate of Mr. Ellis should be allowed the sum of $4,000 in full for his services.

And that amount was allowed and paid. The Secretary further says:

I do not see any merit in the claim set up by Mr. McKnight, as the surviving partner of the law firm of Ellis, Johns & McKnight, and his claim is rejected.

The claim of C. M. Carter.—Mr. Carter's legal services extended from the latter part of 1883 to the year 1893; they are fully recognized by Mr. Bryan, who swears in his affidavit on file that the Old Settler Cherokees were benefited to the full extent of the amount agreed to be paid to Mr. Carter for his legal services; that he has advanced $213 to pay costs in their case. I am satisfied that Mr. Carter is justly entitled to be paid the full amount of his claim for legal services, viz, $3,185, and that sum is allowed.

And he was paid.

The claim of Joel L. Baugh.—I am unable to see what services Mr. Baugh has rendered which would justify the payment to him of the sum of $6,000. His services may have been valuable, but it is not easy to perceive just exactly what they were. But, under all the circumstances, I would approve an allowance to him of the sum of $1,000.

The claim of John W. Douglas.—Mr. Douglas was employed as one of the attorneys of these Indians in the Court of Claims in the early part of 1884, and until the year 1889, when he was appointed one of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. His services were valuable and meritorious, and the compensation which he asks is moderate, viz, the sum of $2,500, which is allowed.

The claim of John L. McCoy.—This is a claim filed in behalf of the administratrix of John L. McCoy, deceased, who was for a short time a commissioner for the Old Settlers. It appears that he was appointed in 1875 and served about two years. I am unable to see what claim Mr. McCoy has upon this fund, and I agree with you in its rejection.

And so the Secretary of the Interior comments upon all these claims, passing upon them and allowing what in his judgment ought to be allowed, having before him all the contracts and all the facts in the case. I submit that it is a little unsafe to adopt the amendment of the committee without the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah. If gentlemen are anxious simply that justice should be done to these claimants, there is no reason why the Court of Claims should not have jurisdiction to inquire into all the facts and ascertain how much the claimants have received. It appears from the report of the Secretary, as I said before, that they have already been paid out of this fund $198,000, and then other claimants filed their claims and their claims were passed upon by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and by the Secretary of the Interior; and many of them were disallowed because they were absolutely without merit; others were allowed for a small sum.

With the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, giving the court jurisdiction to inquire into all the facts, if these parties have already been fully paid and there is any sum remaining out of the sum of 35 per cent, it belongs to the Indians, and out of professed regard for the Indians we ought to do whatever we can to secure them in their rights.

Without reading at length this report, I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TELLER. It has been printed, and it has been read here half a dozen times.

Mr. BURROWS. Has it been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Every item.

Mr. TELLER. And it has been discussed here. However, I do not object to its going into the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS. Very well; instead of reading it to any further extent, as I would be obliged to do if objection is made, I will ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator desires to read it, I do not care.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask that it be printed in connection with the vote on this proposition, and I trust the amendment of the Senator from Utah will be adopted. It certainly can do nobody any harm, and it may be that it will preserve the right of the Indians to this fund.

Mr. TELLER. If the amendment of the Senator from Utah was that they should be charged with what they have got, so that when a man got within $500 of what he ought to have had he might be charged with what he had received, the amendment would be fair; but the amendment is just opposite; it prevents every man who has ever received a dollar from getting another dollar. That is the objection to it.

Mr. BROWN. Then let it read "and accepted in full payment."

Mr. TELLER. If you will add the words "in full payment" after "accepted," that will cover it, because some of these people entered a protest very vigorously that they were not properly paid.

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to adding those words.

Mr. BURROWS. It can be modified in that way.

Mr. TELLER. If they received any money, and have not received as much as the court says they should have received, that is to be a charge against them.

Mr. BROWN. After the word "accepted," I will add the words "in full payment."

Mr. TELLER. That is all I desire.

Mr. BROWN. I understand the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall not accept it, but I shall not call for the yeas and nays. I want to have the matter disposed of.

Mr. BURROWS. I should like to have the document to which I referred printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The following is the document referred to.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, TRANSMITTING REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, IN RESPONSE TO SENATE RESOLUTION OF MARCH 2, 1895, DIRECTING THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR TO REPORT TO THE SENATE ANY AND ALL PAYMENTS AND DISTRIBUTIONS FROM THE APPROPRIATION OF $300,386.31 IN FAVOR OF THE "OLD SETTLERS," OR WESTERN CHEROKEE INDIANS, MADE BY ACT OF AUGUST 23, 1894.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, January 13, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution of March 2, 1895, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to withhold any further distribution and payment out of the money derived from thirty-five per cent of the judgment in favor of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians against the United States, in the sum of eight hundred thousand three hundred and eighty-six dollars and thirty-one cents, set apart for the payment of expenses and for legal services justly and equitably payable on account of the prosecution of said claim, until otherwise authorized by law, except allowances already made for legal services, and to report to the Senate any and all payments and distributions from said fund already made, with copies of all papers in any manner connected with said payments and distributions filed in the Interior Department and the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the action had thereon."

In response thereto, I transmit herewith copy of a communication of the 17th instant from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to whom the resolution was referred.

This disposes of all the claims that were paid. There were other claimants, but as the resolution calls only for the amounts paid, no report upon the unpaid claimants is made, except as they are discussed in the accompanying exhibits.

In reply to the request for "copies of all papers in any manner connected with said payments and distributions filed in the Interior Department and the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the action had thereon," I have the honor to say that with the clerical force of this office it is utterly impracticable to furnish the copies required. The papers are very voluminous, many of the exhibits being printed volumes of many pages. There accompany this, however, copies of all the material papers, showing the conclusions of this office and the Department, and giving reasons therefor.

Very respectfully,

D. M. BROWNING, Commissioner.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

EXHIBIT A.

TAHLEQUAH, CHEROKEE NATION, IND. T.,
November 22, 1875.

The Western or Old Settler Cherokees, in pursuance of previous appointment, having met in convention under authority of the provisions of the Cherokee treaty of 1846, to consider the best method of prosecuting their claim for a balance due them of per capita funds from the Government of the United States, under the Cherokee treaties of 1835–36 and 1846, adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved by the Western or Old Settler Cherokees in general convention assembled, That it is the sense of said Cherokees that the Government of the United States is legally indebted to them (the said Cherokees) for a balance of per capita moneys due under the Cherokee treaties of 1833, 1835–36, and 1846, with interest on the same up to date of final payment, and was withheld from said Cherokees when the per capita funds were paid the Cherokee people in 1851–52, under the provisions of the treaties of 1835–36 and 1846.

Resolved further, That the partial payment of said per capita moneys made to said Old Settler Cherokees in 1851 is not and can not be in law or equity a final and full settlement between the United States Government and said Old Settler Cherokees on account of their said per capita funds, due under said treaty of 1835–36 and 1846, for the following reasons:

"First. That the said partial payment was practically forced upon said Cherokees by the United States.

"Second. That at the time of said partial payment in 1851 said Old Settler Cherokees filed a written protest with the disbursing officer or paymaster of the Government (Mr. Drennen), protesting that the payment then made was not a full payment of the moneys due said Old Settlers under said treaties, and reserving their rights to the balance due them of said per capita funds, and that in 1849–50 the Old Settlers' delegate, J. L. McCoy, filed his protest in the Department at Washington, claiming the whole amount due.

"Third. That the treaty of 1846 referred to makes specific provisions that no misapplied funds or charges shall be deducted from the per capita funds, 'Old Settler Cherokees,' under said treaties in a final settlement.

"Resolved further, That inasmuch as the treaty of 1846 abolished all party distinctions in the nation except in so far as the same may be necessary to carry out the provisions of said treaty, and said treaty also made further provisions that the Cherokee people or any part of them could peaceably assemble and petition their own government or the Government of the United States for a redress of grievances, the said Old Settler or Western Cherokees have, from time to time, before and since the late war of the rebellion, met in convention for the purpose of prosecuting and recovering of their said claim for the said balance due them, but have so far failed to secure any final result or settlement for the want of funds to aid such prosecution.

"Resolved further, That it is deemed expedient and proper that the said Old Settler Cherokees prosecute the said claim before the Government of the United States to a speedy, just, and final settlement; and for that purpose the following-named persons, J. L. McCoy, J. M. Bryan, and William Wilson, be, and they are hereby constituted a commission, with full powers to represent said Cherokees before the Government, with full and ample authority to do and cause to be done any act and doing necessary and proper to be done in the premises; and with full authority to employ such assistance in the prosecution of said claim as they may deem necessary, and that a sum equal to 35 per cent of the amount of said claim when recovered, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be set apart and subject to the draft and receipt of said commission, and payable to them or their order by the proper authorities of the United States Government, which per cent shall be applied in the payment of said prosecution and all incidental expenses; Provided, That on a final settlement with said Old Settler Cherokees, the said commission account for their expenditures out of said per cent, and all receipts signed to said United States Government by said commission on account of said per cent shall be taken and deemed to be the receipts of said Old Settler Cherokees for the amount received.

"Resolved further, That said commission, either in whole or in part, at their discretion, be authorized to proceed at their earliest convenience to Washington, D. C., to prosecute said claim, and for that purpose they, the said commission, are authorized to make a loan from the Cherokee Nation for funds sufficient to defray their necessary expenses.

"Resolved further, That the president of this convention furnish the said commission with a copy of these resolutions."

I certify that the above and foregoing resolutions is a true copy of the original resolutions, this, the 25th day of November, 1875.

WILLIAM WILSON,
President Convention.

Secretary.

UNION AGENCY, December 20, 1875.

I hereby certify that Messrs. J. L. McCoy, J. M. Bryan, and William Wilson, are known to me as Old Settlers, and were duly appointed November 22, 1875, as commissioners to represent the Old Settlers' claim before the Department and Congress at Washington.

EXHIBIT B.

Proceedings of the meeting of the ninth annual council of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians, held at Tahlequah, in the Cherokee Nation, on the 25th day of October, 1883, to further consider the prosecution of their claim against the United States for moneys due them under the treaties of 1835–36 and 1846, and the several acts of Congress in relation thereto, and to authorize and direct their commissioners and treasurer in that respect, which convention is held in pursuance of the power and authority of that part of the second article of the treaty of 1846 which provides that all parties shall cease except so far as they may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the said treaty with respect to said Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians.

Mr. William Wilson, permanent president, in the chair; Robert L. Owen, secretary.

A committee was appointed, after the annual report of the commission was read and adopted, consisting of the following representative Old Settler Cherokees, to wit: Judge Riley Keyes, Capt. B. W. Alberty, H. C. Barnes, Aaron Terrell, and R. L. Owen. The committee reported to the convention the following resolutions, which, after being fully discussed, were unanimously adopted:

RESOLUTIONS.

First. That we tender our thanks to the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for their efforts to have justice done in the investigation and payment of our claim.

Second. Resolved, That we memorialize the Senate of the United States to appoint a committee, to be composed of three Senators, to take the "Old Settler" claim in hand, to investigate the claim, correct any errors that may have been made by any authority of the United States Government, and report the amount found for appropriation.

Third. Resolved, That our councilors and clerks be paid each $4 a day, and that a competent committee of three persons be appointed to sit at Tahlequah during the next session of the national council, to receive from each clerk and councilor and commissioner the amount then due; said committee to be appointed by the president of the present council, and said committee to be paid $4 per day for their services.

Fourth. Resolved, That at the earnest request of Mr. Bryan we hereby relieve him from acting as treasurer of the 35 per cent set apart for the purpose of prosecuting the Old Settler claim.

Fifth. Resolved, That when the amounts of our home council expenses and our commissioners' services shall be made out by the committee above provided for, the said committee shall forward a statement of the same, revised and approved by the commission, to the Secretary of the Interior, who is hereby authorized and requested to pay the same after the appropriation of the sums due us shall have been made.

Sixth. Resolved, That in consideration of the continuous and faithful labor and expenses of J. M. Bryan for eight or nine years in prosecuting, under much uncertainty of ever receiving a dollar's reward, the Old Settler Cherokee claim, at his own expense, even paying printing bills, expenses of attorneys who were helping the claim, etc., he having sold everything he has in the prosecution of this claim, practicing law whenever in the nation in order to keep up his expenses, and thus giving his entire time and energy to this work; and in further consideration of the said J. M. Bryan having contracted a large part of the 2½ per cent for assistance in the management of said claim, we, the Old Settler Cherokee Indians, in council assembled, agree to pay Mr. Bryan 2½ per cent additional, making in all 5 per cent; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is respectfully requested to have the same paid to J. M. Bryan out of the 35 per cent set apart for the prosecution of our said claim. The honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs is respectfully requested to pay to Mr. Bryan, our Old Settler commissioner, for his services as such, out of the 35 per cent as above stated, at $4 a day from November 22, 1875, until the claim is closed: Be it further resolved, That all contracts with attorneys, or any other person or persons, for services hereafter to be presented for the approval of the Secretary of the Interior of the United States be first approved by our three commissioners, J. M. Bryan, William Wilson, and W. H. Hendricks.

Seventh. The acts of all previous councils of the Old Settlers are hereby reaffirmed and declared to be in full force, except where contrary to these resolutions, in which case such acts or parts of acts are repealed.

President of the Convention.

EXHIBIT C.

Proceedings of the meeting of the tenth annual council of the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians, held at Tahlequah, in the Cherokee Nation, on the 31st day of October, A. D. 1884, to further consider the prosecution of their claim against the United States for moneys due them under the treaties of 1835–36 and 1846, and the several acts of Congress in relation thereto, and to direct and authorize their commissioners and treasurer in that respect, which convention is held in pursuance of the power and authority of that part of the second article of the treaty of 1846 which provides that all party distinctions shall cease except so far as they may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the said treaty with respect to said Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians.

Mr. William Wilson, permanent president, being ill and unable to attend the convention, Mr. Henry C. Barnes was elected by the convention as president pro tempore, and after a full and exhaustive report of the management and status of the claim by Col. J. M. Bryan, spokesman for the commission, a committee was appointed, after the report was read and adopted, consisting of the following representative Old Settler Cherokees: Clem Hayden, chairman; Robert L. Owen, secretary; Aaron Terrell, E. Cornelius Boudinot, and Joseph Gladney, for the purpose of examining the report of the commissioners, Bryan, Wilson, and Hendricks, and reporting to the convention what they should deem a judicious course.

After thoroughly discussing the report of the commission, with contracts, documents, etc., submitted therewith, the committee unanimously reported the following resolutions:

RESOLUTIONS.

Be it resolved by the Old Settler Cherokees, That there having been contracted, by our authority, with different attorneys in the States, by our commissioners, Bryan, Wilson, and Hendricks, the amount of 22½ per cent of the amount recovered of our claim for services actually rendered in the prosecution of the Old Settler Cherokee claim, of which 13 per cent has been approved and 9½ per cent is as yet unapproved by the Interior Department, we hereby approve the two other contracts, to wit, John A. Sibbold's, for 5 per cent, and C. M. Carter's, for 4½ per cent, of the recovery, and respectfully request, if necessary, that the honorable Secretary of the Interior also approve the same.

Be it further resolved, That as no suitable or proper fee has been allowed our commissioners, William Wilson, president of the commission, and William Hendricks, for their enterprise and foresight in reviving the claim and working in its behalf so faithfully, we hereby allow them 2 per cent each in full of their services, and that this and the per diem allowance for the services of J. M. Bryan as our special attorney and commissioner, as well as the 5½ per cent provided for him by our councils of 1877 and 1883, be also approved by the Interior Department, if necessary, and that the honorable Secretary is especially requested to have the same done, our said attorney and commissioner having devoted his entire time for nearly ten years and his whole fortune to the interests of the Old Settler Cherokees.

Be it further resolved, That for the purpose of harmonizing all our contracts for defraying expenses of our commissioners and home expenses, and the payment of two attorneys' fees not approved by the Interior Department, and for the payment of borrowed money from the Cherokee Nation, as authorized by our council, that Col. Joel M. Bryan be, and he is hereby, appointed treasurer of the Old Settlers, and as such is hereby authorized to receive from the proper officer or officers an amount of money out of any sum or sums that may be allowed said Old Settlers or Western Cherokees, as may be necessary to meet the provisions of this our council's decisions, the amounts of which are hereinafter itemized, to receipt to the United States therefor in the name of and for us, which said receipt shall be as binding upon the Old Settler Indians as if executed by them individually, and shall be the Old Settler Cherokees' receipt therefor.

Be it further resolved, That the following amounts are hereby approved, and our treasurer is hereby authorized to disburse said funds when received in payment of said amounts, to wit:

	Per cent.
1. For attorneys' fees not as yet allowed by the Interior Department, 0½ per cent of the entire claim recovered	0½
2. For Joel M. Bryan, himself as by act of the councils of 1877 and 1883, 5½ per cent of the entire claim recovered	5½
3. For Joel M. Bryan, as commutation of his per diem allowance, 1½ per cent of the entire claim recovered	1½
4. For our commissioners, Wilson and Hendricks, 4 per cent of the entire claim recovered	4
5. For our debts to the Cherokee Nation for borrowed money and for home and contingent expenses, 2 per cent of the entire claim recovered	2
Total amount	22

Be it further resolved, That J. M. Bryan is hereby authorized to present the claim of the Old Settler Cherokees to the United States Government for the value of the lands and improvements at the old Cherokee Agency in the State of Arkansas, on the Arkansas River, due to us under the treaties of 1828 and 1833.

Signed by the committee.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

EXHIBIT E.

In the matter of the claims for attorneys' fees in the Old Settler Cherokee cases.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 5, 1895.

SIR: Pending the consideration of the claims of various attorneys for fees in the above-stated matter, I have concluded that inasmuch as there is no contest over the fees claimed by the following-named persons, to wit, Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot, for $32,015.45; Garland & May, for $15,000; John C. Heard, for $10,000, and the Wilshire estate for $13,500, the same should be paid without further delay.

I therefore approve your findings in respect to these claims, and direct that the same be paid.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

EXHIBIT F.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, August 31, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith, for your consideration and approval, an account in favor of Messrs. John Paul Jones, Reese H. Voorhees, and E. C. Boudinot, accompanied by the affidavits of Reese H. Voorhees and other papers and documents in connection therewith, for professional services rendered in behalf of the Old Settler Cherokee Indians, under their contract dated November 4, 1889, in procuring for the benefit of said Indians, by act of Congress approved August 23, 1894, the sum of $200,386.31, of which sum the claimants herewith are to receive as compensation for said services an amount equal to 4 per cent on said sum, amounting to $32,015.45, under the terms of said contract.

Very respectfully,

D. M. BROWNING, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

EXHIBIT G.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, November 21, 1895.

SIR: An appropriation was made by a clause in the general deficiency act approved August 23, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 424, 451), to pay a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of the Old Settler or Western Cherokees, as follows, viz:

"The Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians, by Joel M. Bryan, William Wilson, and William H. Hendricks, commissioners, and Joel M. Bryan, treasurer, and so forth, eight hundred thousand three hundred and eighty-six dollars and thirty-one cents; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is directed to withhold from distribution among said Indians only so much of that part of the said judgment set apart by said Indians to pay the expenses and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of said prosecution."

The claim which this appropriation was intended to satisfy had been pending for a great many years. In 1875 the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians held a council and appointed commissioners to prosecute the claim, setting apart for defraying the expense of such prosecution 35 per cent of whatever sum might be recovered to the Indians on account of the claim. Out of this 35 per cent the commissioners were authorized to employ the professional services of attorneys at law and to pay the other expenses incidental to the prosecution of the claim. Subsequently to the setting aside of this percentage the Indians in council at various times made specific appropriations therefrom for different purposes, as follows, viz:

	Per cent.
For J. M. Bryan, commissioner and treasurer	6½
For William H. Hendricks, commissioner	2
For William Wilson, commissioner	2
For payment of debts of Old Settlers, money borrowed from Cherokee Nation	2
Total	12½

These appropriations by the council of the Old Settlers reduced the amount that was available for use by the commissioners in the employment of counsel to 22½ per cent of the amount recovered.

Lawful contracts made by the Old Settlers commissioners have received the approval of this office and the Secretary of the Interior, providing for fees as follows, viz:

	Per cent.
W. W. Wilshire	5
W. S. Peabody	8
E. J. Ellis (conditional)	2
Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot	4
Garland & May (about)	1½
C. M. Carter	¼
Joel L. Baugh (conditional)	1¼
Total	22½

The condition on which Mr. Ellis's contract was approved was that the value of the services rendered by the attorney prior to his death and under the contract as a quantum meruit should be left to be thereafter adjudicated, and the condition on which Mr. Baugh's contract was approved was that the fee payable thereunder, together with the fees allowed under other approved contracts and the amounts appropriated by the Old Settlers council, should not exceed 35 per cent.

Since the appropriation has been made, the following claims have been paid:

September 6, 1894, to J. M. Bryan, 6½ per cent	$52,025.11
September 8, 1894, to William Wilson, 2 per cent	16,007.73
September 8, 1894, to William H. Hendricks, 2 per cent	16,007.73
Total, 10½ per cent	84,040.58

Claims of attorneys for services have been adjudicated by this office under section 2104 of the Revised Statutes and transmitted to the Department for its action, as follows:

August 31, 1894, claim of Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot, 4 per cent	$32,015.45
September 5, 1894, claim of Garland & May, 1½ per cent	15,000.00
Total, 5½ per cent	47,015.45

Claims have been filed in this office by attorneys and parties in whose favor the Old Settlers have made appropriations, including those whose claims have been paid, as follows, viz:

	Per cent.		Per cent.
J. M. Bryan	6½	Joel L. Baugh	1¼
William Wilson	2	John T. Heard	1½
Wm. H. Hendricks	2	J. W. Douglas	¼
J. M. Bryan (treasurer)	2	S. O. Hemingway	¼
Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot	4	John L. McCoy	2
Garland & May (about)	1½	Richard C. Wintersmith	25
W. W. Wilshire	1¼	Belva A. Lockwood	10
W. S. Peabody	8	J. J. Newall	2½
D. A. McKnight, for estate of E. J. Ellis	2	Total	72⅞
C. M. Carter (about)	¼

The total of the claims submitted in excess of the amount available for fees to attorneys in this case is 50⅞ per cent, and in excess of fees provided for in approved contracts is 49⅞ per cent. This includes 1½ per cent which the act of August 15, 1894 (28 Stat., 31, Private Laws), authorizes to be paid to Mr. John T. Heard on the determination of the Secretary of the Interior that services were rendered the Old Settlers by said Heard and were contracted for in good faith by persons authorized to represent said Indians, and 12½ per cent appropriated by the Old Settlers' council. There remains in claims presented, not covered by approved contracts, resolutions of the councils of Old Settlers, nor the act of Congress of August 15, 1894, above referred to, 35⅞ per cent.

Some of these claimants for themselves, and others by their attorneys, claim that the provisions of the law making the appropriation authorizes the payment of their claims as being "equitably" due on account of legal services rendered in the prosecution of the claim of the Indians. This claim involves the pro tanto repeal of the laws relating to Indian contracts and the adjudication and payment of the fees of attorneys under such contracts. Before entering into a discussion of the specific claims, therefore, it seems expedient that I shall consider the scope and effect upon the claims that should be given the language used in the act making the appropriation to meet the judgment in the case.

That part of the act relied upon by the attorneys claiming under unapproved contracts is the following:

"And the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is directed to withhold from distribution among said Indians only so much of that part of the said judgment set apart by the Indians for the prosecution of their claims as is necessary for him to pay the expenses and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of said prosecution."

The law relating to contracts between Indian tribes and individual Indians, not citizens of the United States, and attorneys, is section 2103 of the Revised Statutes, which requires that such contracts shall contain certain prescribed stipulations, and shall be executed in a peculiar manner, and be approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Section 2104 of the Revised Statutes provides for the payment by the United States, out of the Indians' moneys, of the fees of attorneys earned under such contracts, and is as follows:

"And no money or thing shall be paid to any person for services under such contract or agreement until such person shall have first filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a sworn statement showing each particular act of service under the contract, giving date and fact in detail, and the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall determine therefrom whether, in their judgment, such contract or agreement has been complied with or fulfilled; if so, the same may be paid, in proportion to the services rendered under the contract."

Section 2105 of the Revised Statutes prohibits the payment of any fees to attorneys for Indians, except as provided in the two preceding sections, and also prohibits the attorney from receiving such fee contrary to law, heavy penalties being provided both against the unlawful paying and the unlawful receiving of such money or fees.

There are no words of repeal used in the act making the appropriation, and before the language used in said act can be construed as it is claimed by the claimants under unapproved contracts it should be, it must be held to have the effect of repealing the statutes of the United States above referred to by mere implication. It is probably not material to the determination of the question whether the sections of the Revised Statutes bearing on the case have been repealed by the act making the appropriation to state the purposes for which it was deemed desirable to amend the language of the appropriation as originally introduced in the bill; but as this office is fully aware of the object of the attorneys who first suggested the amendment, there having been several conferences on the subject between said attorneys and myself, it may not be deemed improper for me to state those purposes as I understood them at the time and do now understand them to have been.

In rendering the opinion of the Supreme Court (148 U. S., 427) giving judgment against the United States in favor of the Old Settlers, Chief Justice Fuller made use of certain language which might be construed to deny to some extent the right of the Old Settlers to maintain a tribal organization for any purpose, and to operate to prevent the payment of fees earned by attorneys under contracts made with said Indians as a body politic and approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Another consideration was that by the rules of the Treasury Department under the old methods of accounting, all judgments of the Supreme Court were paid by the First Auditor and First Comptroller. This appropriation would not, therefore, come on the books of this office, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and Secretary of the Interior would not be able to pay the fees due attorneys under approved contracts. No other officers of the Government have jurisdiction to adjudicate such claims, and the attorneys would in consequence be likely to lose the fees that had been earned by them even should it have been eventually determined that the Supreme Court's opinion would not interfere with their payment.

It was to meet the possible contingency of such a construction of the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case and to bring the appropriation within the jurisdiction of this office that the attorneys thought it desirable to amend the appropriation, and in informal discussions of the situation with Mr. Voorhees and other attorneys in the case I agreed with them as to the expediency of such a step. It was under the circumstances and at the instance of attorneys having approved contracts that the amendment to the appropriation was made.

The statute must be construed in accordance with the ordinary rules laid down by the courts for the construction of statutes.

As to the construction that the Revised Statutes have been repealed by implication and a new rule established by the appropriation act to govern the payment of attorneys' fees in this case, it is a well-established rule of construction that repeals by implication are not favored and are never admitted where the former can stand with the new act. (Chew Heong vs. United States, 112 U. S., 536; United States vs. Henderson, 11 Wall., 652.)

In Wood vs. The United States (16 Peters, 362) the Supreme Court said:

"The question then arises whether the sixty-sixth section of the act of 1799, chapter 128, has been repealed or whether it remains in full force. That it has not been expressly or by direct terms repealed is admitted; and the question resolves itself into the more narrow inquiry, whether it has been repealed by necessary implication. We say by necessary implication, for it is not sufficient to establish that subsequent laws cover some or even all the cases provided for by it, for they may be merely affirmative or cumulative or auxiliary. But there must be a positive repugnancy between the provisions of the new laws and those of the old, and even then the old law is repealed by implication only pro tanto to the extent of the repugnancy."

Under the rule laid down in this case repeals by implication must be necessary; that is, it must be necessary to imply the repeal of a former to give effect to a later statute before such repeal will be admitted. There must be such a repugnancy between the laws of the old and those of the new statute that they can not be construed nor administered together.

Upon examination of the language of the appropriation it will be observed that it is not in any manner repugnant to section 2104 of the Revised Statutes. It does not purport to establish in this case a new rule to guide the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in adjudication of the claims of attorneys. In fact, it implies a power already possessed by the Commissioner to withhold from distribution among the Indians some part of the money appropriated, and purports only to give him specific direction as to the exercise of that power. "The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is directed to withhold from distribution among said Indians only so much," etc. The law is merely directory, and relates to the exercise of a power already resting in the Commissioner under existing law. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is directed to withhold, etc., "only so much of that part of the said judgment set apart by the said Indians for the prosecution of their claim as is necessary for him to pay the expenses and for legal services justly or equitably payable," etc.

This authority to withhold only so much of the part of the judgment set apart by the Indians for the prosecution of the claim as is necessary for him to pay the expenses and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of said prosecution does not change the law that authorizes him to pay out such funds, and although authorized to withhold a certain part of the fund from distribution among the Indians, yet when payments of fees out of that fund come to be made he must be governed by the law which provides how legal claims can be established. Persons without approved contracts who are now insisting that they shall have this fund paid out to them knew when their supposed agreements were made and the service, if any, was rendered that they were not only prohibited from receiving payment, but that to do so they would be guilty of an offense punishable under section 2105 of the Revised Statutes.

The question might be raised whether the term "legal services" as used in this provision of law does not mean services lawfully rendered.

The payments out of this appropriation for "legal services" must be restricted to such fees as may be shown to be "justly or equitably payable" to those attorneys who rendered service under approved contracts which did not expire by limitation prior to the recovery.

This rule must be varied from somewhat in the cases of the estates of W. W. Wilshire and E. John Ellis, who died before the expiration of their contracts, and after rendering "legal services" thereunder, and the claim of John T. Heard is governed by the special act of Congress for his relief.

As the statutes relating to Indian contracts and the payment of fees thereunder is still in force and applicable in this case, they would operate to prevent the payment of any fees to those attorneys who base their claims on informal or unapproved contracts.

Having thus disposed of all claims of attorneys who have no approved contracts as a class, it is not necessary for me to specifically discuss any of the claims of that class; but in order to show the absurdity of some that have been filed, I will cite briefly the claims of R. C. Wintersmith and Mrs. Belva Lockwood.

Mr. Wintersmith's claim is for 25 per cent of the amount appropriated, or $200,000, and it is based on a power of attorney dated November 29, 1873, and signed by Riley Keys, J. A. Scales, and John L. McCoy, who held themselves out as the legal representatives of the Old Settler Cherokees. It is not signed by Mr. Wintersmith, and there is no evidence that said Keys, Scales, and McCoy were ever authorized by the Old Settlers to represent them or to make a contract on their behalf. It does not appear from the records of the Old Settlers case in this office that either Keys or Scales were ever appointed by the Indians to represent them in the suit. McCoy was appointed in 1875 as a representative, but served only about two years in that capacity, when he was dropped by the council, and Hendricks was appointed in his stead.

Furthermore, Mr. Wintersmith does not show by proper proof that he ever rendered any services under his alleged contract. He states, however, that since his so-called employment in 1873 to the present time he has labored as attorney for these Indians. This is a singular statement in the light of the fact that Mr. Wintersmith was never known, so far as the records of the case show, to have been interested in the prosecution of the Old Settlers claim until he filed his claim for services.

Mrs. Lockwood's claim of 10 per cent, or about $80,000, is based on several powers of attorney to J. J. Newell, herself, and others, given by various parties claiming authority to bind the Old Settlers. Some of these powers of attorney and contracts were given by parties authorized to make contracts, but they were never approved as required by law, although they had been filed for approval. It is not necessary to set out here the reasons for not approving them. In her claim Mrs. Lockwood seems to have confused the claims of the Western North Carolina Cherokees and of the Eastern Band of Cherokees with that of the Old Settlers, and most of the services she claims to have rendered related to the suits of the Indians of the former classes exclusively. She mentions an informal contract between J. M. Bryan and herself stipulating for the employment of her services in the Old Settlers case.

In her claim Mrs. Lockwood files a contract between herself and James Taylor, John L. McCoy, and James M. Bell, claiming to represent the Western North Carolina Cherokees, i. e., the North Carolina and Eastern Cherokees, who were residing east of the Mississippi River at the date of the treaty of 1835, and who have subsequently removed to the Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory, and the Old Settlers, or Western Cherokees, who were residing west of the Mississippi at the date of said treaty of 1835, by virtue of resolutions of a council of the Western North Carolina Cherokee Indians held November 17, 1884.

At the time of this council the Old Settlers or Western Cherokees were represented by a board of commissioners properly authorized and composed of Messrs. J. M. Bryan, William Wilson, and William H. Hendricks. It is hardly necessary for me to say that apart from the fact that the Old Settlers by their own council had provided a commission with authority to represent them in the prosecution of their claim, the council of the Western North Carolina Cherokee Indians had no power to authorize the appointment of a representative to prosecute the Old Settlers claim, and therefore Mrs. Lockwood would not have been entitled under her contract to any fee out of the Old Settlers appropriation even if there were not other objections thereto.

The first claim for "legal services" to be considered is that of the estate of W. W. Wilshire, and is based on services rendered by Mr. Wilshire before his death, under two contracts, the second being a continuation of the first. Mr. Wilshire was first employed by the Old Settlers July 1, 1882, the date on which the first contract was made. That contract expired by limitation July 1, 1886, and was renewed by contract dated September 28, 1886, which was limited by its terms to expire September 28, 1891. Both of these contracts were approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior. The contract expired finally in 1891, more than two years prior to the ultimate recovery on behalf of the Indians, and if Mr. Wilshire had been living it is doubtful whether any fees could be paid him on account of his services, notwithstanding they might have been of great value to the Indians in the prosecution of the claim.

This conclusion is based on the well-established rule that where an attorney voluntarily abandons a case in which he has been employed, and thereby makes it necessary for his client to employ the services of other attorneys or counsel, he has no claim against his client for compensation, notwithstanding his services may have been of great value in the preparation and prosecution of the case. The rule would be the same in a case where an attorney has been employed for a term of years to prosecute a claim on compensation of a rate per cent on the amount recovered thereunder. If the recovery is not had before the expiration of his contract, he is not entitled to his fee nor to demand as a matter of right the extension of his employment to cover a further term of years, and if the client shall see fit not to extend the time, but shall employ other counsel, who recovers on the claim, the attorney first employed would not have a right to claim his fee under his expired contract.

This rule does not apply, however, in a case where the abandonment of a suit by the attorney is involuntary, as where he dies before recovery and after rendering services of more or less value to his client. In such an event it seems that the rule is the deceased attorney's estate should be paid a compensation in proportion to the services rendered by him. Upon this rule Mr. Wilshire's estate is entitled to be paid a fee for the services rendered by him in this case prior to his death. It is impossible, however, for the estate to comply with the provisions of section 2104 of the Revised Statutes, which requires the filing of a detailed statement of service under his contract; but as the law should not be construed as requiring a claimant, whose good faith is apparent as in this case, to perform a palpable impossibility, I do not see any legal impediment in the way of paying a reasonable fee in this case.

In arriving at the amount justly due for such services as were rendered by Mr. Wilshire, it is not sufficient to consider the amount of service, but rather its character and value as compared with the services remaining to be rendered before a final recovery was reached. In this view of the matter, I must conclude that the services rendered in securing the report of the special commissioner appointed to investigate the Old Settlers' claim and the concurrence of the Secretary of the Interior in that report were insignificant in value, for the reason that those reports were totally ignored and repudiated by Congress first and the courts afterwards. Congress refused to recognize the findings in those reports as sufficiently accurate to warrant the appropriation of the money to pay the claim, and it was referred by a committee of the Senate to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact under the provisions of the Bowman Act, so called. The Court of Claims reported the findings of fact, and while in the reports of the special commissioner and the Secretary of the Interior it was found that $421,653.63 were due, the court found only about $224,975.68 to be due, and the final judgment of the Supreme Court reduced the amount to $212,376.94.

The most valuable service that was rendered by Mr. Wilshire was, therefore, in connection with the reference of the case to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact and the prosecution of the matter in the court under that reference, he having died before it was referred to the courts for adjudication by the Congress.

Mr. Bryan, on the part of the Old Settlers; and Mrs. Wilshire, on behalf of the estate of W. W. Wilshire, have entered into an agreement of compromise in the case, by which it is understood the estate shall receive the sum of $13,500 in full satisfaction of the claim. This agreement is not, of course, binding on this office nor on the Department, but considering the services rendered by Mr. Wilshire, and that by his death the Indians were placed under the necessity of employing other attorneys to carry on the prosecution of the suit, for whose services they will pay fees aggregating more than the total fee provided for in Mr. Wilshire's contract, I think the amount agreed upon in this compromise is not more than should be paid, and I therefore find the estate entitled to receive that amount as the value of Mr. Wilshire's services as a quantum meruit.

A one-fifth interest in the contract was assigned by Mr. Wilshire in 1883 to Mr. John A. Sibbald, and he has filed in the case a protest against the compromise agreement between Mr. Bryan and Mrs. Wilshire, and also a sworn statement, in general terms, of the services rendered by Mr. Wilshire and himself in the case, and claiming (1) the allowance of a fee of 8½ per cent of the sum recovered as the reasonable minimum value of the services rendered by Wilshire & Sibbald under the contract prior to the death of Wilshire; and (2) the allowance of at least one-half of 1 per cent of the sum recovered for the services rendered by Sibbald under the contract after the death of Judge Wilshire.

The services claimed to have been rendered by Mr. Sibbald after Judge Wilshire's death has relation to the passage of the act of February 25, 1889 (25 Stats., 694), referring the case to the courts for final adjudication. Doubtless Mr. Sibbald rendered some service in this connection, but it will be observed by an examination of the report of the Senate committee on the bill (No. 217, Fiftieth Congress, first session) that the reasons given by every member of the committee except one (Senator JONES, who was opposed to the claim) for the passage of the bill were based on the findings of the Court of Claims, and it would seem, as said by Mr. Heard in a letter of September 1, 1894, on the subject, that the second reference was practically compelled by the findings of fact already reported to the committee by the court.

The services rendered under the contract prior to Mr. Wilshire's death, which Mr. Sibbald values at 8½ per cent of the total amount of the judgment, have been considered above in the discussion of the compromise agreement referred to, and I find nothing in the papers filed by him to warrant a modification of the conclusion reached to allow the amount fixed in that agreement.

I therefore find that there is justly and equitably payable for "legal services" rendered under the Wilshire contracts the sum of $13,500.

Taking up the claims in the order of the date of the contract on which they are based, the next to be considered is that of W. S. Peabody. This claim is for a fee of $64,000.90, and is based on a contract entered into between said Peabody and the Old Settlers by J. M. Bryan, their agent, attorney, etc. The contract provides for the employment of Mr. Peabody "to prosecute said claim before the proper committees of Congress, the Departments, or courts of the United States to a final termination and collection of the same," for a compensation of 8 per cent on the dollar of the amount collected on said claim. It was to run for four years, and was approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior. As it expired from time to time it was renewed, the last renewal having been approved March 11, 1892.

Mr. Peabody declares himself as being unable to submit a statement of each act of service under this contract, giving fact and date in detail, as required by the statute, but has filed four affidavits, alleging in more or less general terms that he has performed the services called for in the contract.

Before entering into a consideration of the affidavits filed by Mr. Peabody, it seems to me best that I should discuss another matter which has a material bearing on the claim—that is, the fact that for over two years during the life of his contract Mr. Peabody was in the service of the Government, and therefore not in a position to render any service under the same without laying himself liable to heavy penalties under section 5498 of the Revised Statutes. Mr. Peabody entered into the employment of the Government on April 21, 1891, he having been appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to a position in the Geological Survey on that date, and continued in that position until October 20, 1893. While he was so employed, namely, on February 10, 1892, his contract with the Old Settlers was renewed, which renewal, as I have said, was approved by the Department March 11, 1892.

This removal was entered into two months after Mr. Peabody's contract had expired, and when it was presented to this office for approval the question was raised whether the contract could be revived to cover the time which had elapsed between the expiration of the contract and the date of the renewal, the office being of the opinion that, the contract having expired, it was necessary for the parties to make a new contract complying with all the formalities of the statute, and that all rights of the attorney under the old contract had lapsed with its expiration. The question was submitted to the Department with a report of February 24, 1892, with a request that the office be instructed as to whether there was any legal impediment in the way of the approval of the renewal, in view of the time that had passed since the expiration of the contract.

In response to this request the Department, under date of March 5, 1892, transmitted an opinion by the Assistant Attorney-General for the Interior Department, in which he held that there was "no legal objection to the approval of the agreement submitted," and the Secretary advised this office that he concurred in this opinion and saw no objection to the approval of the contract, if it received the favorable consideration of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Accordingly it was approved March 10, 1892, by the Commissioner.

Mr. Peabody has employed Mr. J. M. Vale to prosecute this claim on his behalf, and some time in the latter part of August I requested him to discuss in a brief the question whether Peabody's acceptance of employment by the Government was not such an abandonment of the Old Settlers' case as to debar him from recovering any fee on account of services if any had been rendered by him prior to entering upon such employment.

Mr. Vale claims that Mr. Peabody was exempt from forfeiture on account of his abandonment of the case and acceptance of other employment which prevented him from rendering further service without criminal liability on two grounds, viz:

First. That the contract by its terms left it optional with him to render the service in either one of three places, "the proper committees of Congress, the Departments, or courts of the United States."

Second. That the question was passed on by the Department at the time of the approval of the last renewal, while Mr. Peabody was in the employment of the Government, and it is held that there was "no legal objection to the approval of the renewal."

As to the first ground assigned by Mr. Vale why Mr. Peabody's acceptance of employment by the Government during the life of his contract, and when he might reasonably be called on to render services thereunder, should not be considered an abandonment of the service of the Old Settlers—namely, that the contract contemplated an election by Mr. Peabody of the forum in which his services should be performed—I have to say that it seems to me that such a construction of the contract is not warranted by its terms.

The contract was for Mr. Peabody's employment "to prosecute said claim * * * to a final termination." Where? "Before the proper committees of Congress, the Departments, or courts of the United States;" not either of these places, but wherever it was necessary to appear to prosecute it. Otherwise Mr. Peabody would have been at liberty to elect to prosecute before the courts, and if Congress itself had allowed the claim, and not referred it to the courts for adjudication, he would have had no service to perform.

In that event I apprehend that it would not have been seriously contended that he should have a fee for the services he had elected to perform but was prevented from doing by a settlement of the claim before it reached the courts, yet this is what Mr. Vale's argument would imply. Mr. Vale cites quite a number of authorities in support of his interpretation of the word "or" as it appears in the contract, none of which seem to me to reach the case in point. In fact, to give the word the interpretation he claims for it would have the effect to defeat the apparent purpose of the contract and the clear intention of the parties to be plainly gathered from the context. This seems so plain that I do not feel it necessary to cite authorities on the subject.

With reference to the claim of Mr. Vale that this office and the Department are now estopped from raising the question of Mr. Peabody's abandonment of the Old Settlers' claim in accepting service with the Government by the act of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior in approving the renewal of his contract at the time of his employment in the Geological Survey, the attention of the Department is invited to the fact that there is nothing said in the correspondence relative to the approval referred to which discloses a knowledge on the part of this office or on the part of the Department that Mr. Peabody was so employed. It is possible that the fact of his employment in this Department was a matter of which the office and the Department should have taken judicial knowledge, but I doubt whether that is so, at least so far as this office is concerned. However this may be, I do not see how the fact of the approval of the renewal of Mr. Peabody's contract at the time of his employment by the Government can be said to estop the office and the Department from the proper adjudication of a claim for fees under the contract. The question of whether the attorney would be entitled to any fee at the showing of service was not involved in the consideration of the renewal, and could not arise at that time.

It will be observed that the only question under consideration at the time the renewal was approved was whether the contract could be revived and renewed in the manner in which it was proposed to do so. The question of the payment of fees was a matter to be considered at another time, and could not be passed on at that time. It would seem to me that it could be just as well said that the Secretary and the Commissioner are estopped by their approval of a contract from allowing a less compensation than is provided therein when they come to pass on the claim for fees thereunder.

I am therefore of the opinion that Mr. Peabody was under obligation to render service under his contract in the prosecution of the Old Settlers claim at all times during pendency of the suit, and in every place where the issues between the Indians and the Government were to be tried, and that his acceptance of employment by the Government before the final recovery on the claim was a voluntary abandonment of the prosecution of the case and a forfeiture of his fees for services thereunder, if any had been rendered; also that the approval of the renewal of the contract by the office and the Department during his incumbency in office was not a decision that the services called for in the contract had been rendered so as to entitle him to the fee provided for therein.

I am therefore unable to find that Mr. Peabody is entitled to anything under his contract. He has filed four affidavits of services, neither of which fully complies with the statutes. He declares that he did not keep a memorandum of his services, and that it would be impossible for him to file a statement showing each act of service, with date and fact in detail, as required by law, and that the best he can do is to give inclusive dates within which he rendered service. This he has done in his affidavit of November 13, 1894; but even in this, as in all his other affidavits, he fails to give even one specific date upon which he rendered any single act of service.

In this affidavit he says that between the dates of December 9, 1882, and January 24, 1883, he rendered service before C. C. Clements, the special agent of the Interior Department; between January 24, 1883, and December 12, 1883, he rendered service before the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior; that between December 12, 1883, and February 13, 1884, he rendered services, in connection with Mr. Wilshire and Mr. Sibbald, in advancing the case before committees of Congress, where it was then pending; that during the period from February 13, 1884, to February 9, 1885, he was all ready to consult with his associates, and did so consult when desired; that he, from February 9, 1885, until March 3, 1889, while the case was pending before Congress on the findings of fact by the Court of Claims, was in frequent consultation with his associates and aided in all actions possible by appearing personally and whenever it was proper and advantageous to the case for him to appear and in furtherance of its re-reference to the Court of Claims; that after the case was sent to the Court of Claims the second time he considered his work performed, although he was consulted from time to time between March 3, 1889, and April 21, 1891, on which latter date he entered the Government service, where he remained until October 30, 1893, and during which time he rendered no service under his contract; that from about November 1, 1893, until the passage of the act of August 13, 1894, he was in consultation with his associates from time to time, and rendered service such as was to the best interest of the claim before committees of Congress.

The first date given by Mr. Peabody is that of his contract, and the second date given is that of Mr. Clements's report. The next date is December 12, 1883, which is the date of the report of the Secretary of the Interior on the claim, and February 13, 1884, the case was referred by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate to the Court of Claims under the Bowman Act. February 9, 1885, the Court of Claims reported its findings of fact under that reference, and March 3, 1889, the law was passed referring the case to the courts for adjudication.

It will be observed that all of the dates given by Mr. Peabody are dates of public reports and other actions of public officers, and that his affidavits upon which the law declares the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall determine the amount of fees to be paid to an attorney under his contract are not sufficient to show any service whatever under said contract.

An examination of all the records in this case and all the correspondence relating thereto on file in this office fails to disclose the fact that Mr. Peabody performed any service in the case which would place him on record. The principal acts of service that he seems to claim to have rendered were in connection with the report of Mr. Clements, the special agent, and of the Secretary of the Interior, made in 1883, relative to the claim. As I have said, these reports were, in my opinion, insignificant factors in the case. They were ignored and repudiated by Congress and by the courts. In addition to the fact, therefore, that Mr. Peabody forfeited his fee by entering into the service of the Government during the life of his contract, I am of the opinion that he fails to sufficiently show that he rendered any considerable service in the prosecution of the case under said contract.

In support of his claim Mr. Peabody has filed, in addition to his own affidavit, communications from several gentlemen who were connected with the case, and one from Mr. Bryan himself, in which reference is made in a general way to his services, but these references are too general upon which to base any conclusion as to the value of those services.

Mr. Peabody claims, in round numbers, a fee of $64,000. Taking into consideration the fact that there is evidence of Wilshire's work in connection with all of the matters to which Mr. Peabody claims to have directed his services, and in addition to this that Mr. Wilshire rendered valuable services in the Court of Claims in the prosecution of the case on references for findings of fact, I am satisfied that if Mr. Peabody is entitled to anything at all, it would be much less than has been allowed Mr. Wilshire's estate; not more than $6,000 or $8,000 worth of service, it seems to me, could have been rendered by him, even on his own showing.

I do not, however, for reasons stated above, find that Mr. Peabody is entitled to anything at all under his contract.

The next claim is that of David A. McKnight, as surviving partner of the law firm of Ellis, Johns & McKnight, for compensation for professional services rendered the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians. This claim is based on a contract dated December 15, 1888, between the Old Settlers, by J. M. Bryan, their attorney, etc., and E. John Ellis, then a member of the law firm of Ellis, Johns & McKnight, stipulating for Mr. Ellis's employment as assistant counsel or attorney for said Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians to prosecute their claim before the proper committees of Congress, the Departments, or the courts of the United States, to a final determination and conclusion of the same, for a compensation to be paid him or his legal representatives or assigns of a sum equal to 2 per cent on the dollar of amount collected on said claim.

Mr. Ellis died on April 25, 1889, after having rendered some service under his contract.

The contract was not approved until March 3, 1893, some time after its expiration. This fact is not material in view of the opinion of the Attorney-General, August 4, 1876 (15 Opinions, 585), that the approval of a contract operates by relation to the date of the contract, and has the same effect as if it had then been given, and that a claimant under the contract is not confined to acts of service done subsequently to the date of approval, but may show acts done at a time after the date of the contract.

It is therefore important for those representing Mr. Ellis's estate to show that he had rendered services subsequently to the date of his contract in order for them to recover quantum meruit for services rendered by Mr. Ellis, the compensation to be in proportion that the services rendered bear to those contracted for. (Glendennin vs. Black, 23 Am. Dec., 140; Weeks's Attorneys at Law, sec. 334.)

Mr. McKnight claims first an allowance of the contract fee of 2 per cent on the ground that the contract was made with the firm of Ellis, Johns & McKnight, of which firm Mr. Ellis was a partner, and that the applicant is a surviving member of that firm and the administrator of Mr. Johns, deceased.

Mr. McKnight discusses this claim at some length, and cites authorities to show that a contract made with a member of a firm on firm business is a firm contract. I have not been able to examine all of the references cited by Mr. McKnight in support of this contention, but it seems to me that in view of the well-known rule that a client may contract with a firm of attorneys for the individual services of one partner, and the conduct of Mr. Bryan, the representative of the Old Settlers or Western Cherokees, in making this contract, which clearly shows, if he does not so declare, that his intention in making the said contract was to secure the individual services of Mr. Ellis in this case, I think Mr. McKnight has not sufficiently shown that it was understood by Mr. Bryan, Mr. Ellis, and the other members of his firm that this was a firm contract to sustain his claim.

The record in this case shows that Mr. McKnight, as a representative of the survivors of the firm of Ellis, Johns & McKnight, tendered their services in carrying out the terms of the contract with Mr. Ellis, which services were rejected by Mr. Bryan or by attorneys employed by him in the case, and in accordance with his directions. The contract made by Mr. Ellis with Mr. Bryan might have been treated by the members of his firm among themselves as a firm contract and regarded as an asset of the firm, but that would have been a matter between the parties composing the firm and of which this Department could take no notice. I am of the opinion that the contract with Mr. Ellis was not one on which a suit for specific performance of its terms could have been maintained in the courts against the surviving partners, and therefore was not a firm contract so far as the Indians were concerned.

Second. That if the contract was with Mr. Ellis and not with the firm, the allowance of a fee of 1½ per cent of the amount recovered is a reasonable minimum value of the services rendered by Ellis prior to his death.

In support of this claim it is submitted that Mr. Ellis was entitled to at least 1 per cent for passing the bill of February 25, 1889, referring the case to the courts for adjudication, and that he was entitled to at least one-half per cent for his services in preparing the petition and entering his appearance as counsel in chief or attorney of record in the Court of Claims.

With reference to the claim of 1 per cent for passing the bill of February 25, 1889, the attention of the Department is invited to the fact that nearly every attorney who has submitted a claim in this case has claimed exclusive credit for the passing of this bill. Mr. Ellis being dead it is impossible to require in this case the filing of an affidavit of each act of service, and as the law should not be construed to require that impossible acts should be performed, the value of Mr. Ellis's services in this connection must be determined from proofs of another character.

The Hon. John T. Heard, in a letter to which I have referred above, suggests that the passage of the act of February 25, 1889, was practically compelled by the findings of fact by the Court of Claims on the references under the Bowman Act by the committee of the Senate.

Mr. Sibbald, in his affidavit relative to the services rendered under Mr. Wilshire's contract, claims that the bill was prepared by Mr. Wilshire, and introduced at his instance in Congress. Mr. Peabody claims that he rendered services in connection with the passage of that bill, and, in fact, I think all of the attorneys make this claim in their affidavits in this case, except Mr. Heard, and possibly Messrs. Douglas and Hemmingway. It would therefore be impossible, in view of the record, for this office to hold that Mr. Ellis alone was entitled to the credit of securing the passage of the act of February 25, 1889, by Congress, but that he did perform some service in connection with the passage of that bill is shown by letters from Hon. S. W. Peel and Hon. H. L. Dawes, both of whom said that they knew that Mr. Ellis was interested in the prosecution of the claim, and that he frequently consulted with them upon the subject and with other members of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives and of the Senate. Mr. Peel was chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House of Representatives in the Fiftieth Congress, and Mr. Dawes was chairman of the Committee of Indian Affairs in the Senate during that Congress.

While it is a fact that Mr. Ellis signed the first petition that was filed in the court in behalf of the Old Settlers as attorney of record, the record in this case is not sufficiently clear to satisfy me that Mr. Ellis prepared that petition or that he had any other connection with it than as a consulting attorney and the signing of the same as attorney of record. Considering all together the evidence submitted in other cases bearing on the facts in this case, I do not think that the claim of Mr. McKnight should be allowed as submitted.

But as Mr. Ellis has been shown to have rendered services under his contract, and as he died during the existence of the contract without recovering anything thereunder, his estate, or the assignees of his estate, would be entitled to recover quantum meruit for said services a compensation in proportion that the said services bear to those contracted for. The services contracted for were the prosecution of the claim of the Old Settlers before the proper committees of Congress, the Departments, or the courts of the United States to a final determination and conclusion of the same; that is, the prosecution of the claim before the proper committees of Congress while it is pending before those committees; before the Departments of the United States while it might have been pending before the Departments, and in the courts of the United States, should it be pending before the courts.

There were but little over four months between the date of Mr. Ellis's contract and his decease, and during that time there was nothing to be done, or nothing was done, except to secure the passage of the act of Congress referred to and the filing of the first petition in the Court of Claims. As has been shown, several attorneys had connection with the passage of the act, and I think it is sufficiently shown that the petition was drawn by Messrs. Jones & Voorhees; so that Mr. Ellis's services in connection with this matter were very small. It is, of course, a most difficult thing to decide, upon the uncertain evidence presented in this case, what an attorney's services, such as were rendered by Mr. Ellis, should be valued at, but it seems to me, in view of the compensation payable to other attorneys in this case, that Mr. Ellis's estate, or assignees of his estate, would not be entitled to recover on account of those services more than $2,000, and I therefore determine that that amount is justly or equitably payable to Mr. McKnight, as an assignee and administrator of an assignee of the estate of Mr. Ellis, for legal services performed by him under said contract.

The next claim in order of date of contract is that of Messrs. Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot. This claim was discussed in a report of August 31, 1894, wherein I submitted my determination in the case to the Department and reference is had here to that report.

The next claim in order is that of Messrs. Garland & May, which was discussed in my report of September 5, 1894, to which I here refer.

The claim of C. M. Carter is based on a contract of February 15, 1893, and is for $3,185. In addition to this he claims the sum of $333, which was advanced by him to Mr. Bryan to pay the expense of printing, etc. Inasmuch as the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians have by their council appointed a treasurer and set apart 2 per cent of the amount recovered to pay the debts of the Indians, money borrowed or money advanced to Mr. Bryan must be paid by him as the treasurer of the Old Settlers.

Mr. Carter has filed two affidavits in support of his claim, one dated March 13, 1894, and the other dated September 7, 1894, but neither one of these affidavits is sufficient to authorize the payment to him of the fee under his contract. They show services in general terms rendered under so-called contracts of different dates from November 28, 1883, to and including January 27, 1893. None of these contracts were ever approved by this office and the Department as required by law, and the services rendered thereunder can not be paid for under sections 2104 and 2105 of the Revised Statutes.

The contract of February 15, 1893, was approved by this office February 28, 1893, and by the Department March 2, 1893. Prior to the approval of this contract the office, in a letter of February 21, 1893, advised Mr. Carter that it could not approve a contract for services rendered prior to the date thereof. It would be impossible, therefore, for this Department to authorize the payment of any fee to him on account of services rendered under any alleged former contract which had not been approved in accordance with the provisions of the statutes, but that his contract could be approved so as to authorize him to render services thereunder after its date, and receive a proper compensation therefor.

He was also advised that the amount of fee or compensation to be paid under his said contract, if it were approved, must be determined by a showing made by him as to the services actually rendered after its date, such showing to be made in accordance with the provisions of section 2104 of the Revised Statutes, and that if he desired the contract approved upon these conditions, and would advise this office to that effect, proper consideration thereof would be given.

Under date of February 23, 1893, Mr. Carter filed in this office in quadruplicate an affidavit made by him February 22, 1893, setting forth the services that he expected to render under the contract, and informally indicated to the office that it was his wish to have the contract approved, so that he might be paid for services rendered after the date thereof, and in view of this the contract was approved by the office and transmitted on February 28 with a report to the Department for the action of the Secretary of the Interior thereon, the approval being indorsed on the contract in the following language, viz: "The within contract is hereby approved so that payment may be made for such services only as may be rendered by the attorney thereunder after the date thereof."

In a communication of September 7, 1894, Mr. Carter says that in making the contracts with Mr. Bryan he understood that he was contracting with a white man, a citizen of the United States domiciled in the Cherokee country and duly and properly delegated and authorized by the Old Settlers to attend to the prosecution of their claims, and that his authority as such agent and representative was recognized by the Department; therefore he did not deem it necessary under the law to seek to have his contracts approved. The mistake that Mr. Carter made in this respect is that the contracts were not with Mr. Bryan, but with the Old Settler Cherokees, by Mr. Bryan, their attorney in fact. Mr. Bryan is one of the Old Settler Cherokees and was properly delegated to represent them in making these contracts.

Under date of November 14, 1894, I wrote Mr. Carter, asking him to furnish this office with an affidavit setting forth his services under his contract, which had been approved. This, I infer, he declines to do from his letter of November 16, 1894, in which he takes the position that the language used in making the appropriation in Congress lays down a different rule for the adjudication of the claims and that his fee is justly and equitably due, and therefore the claim is not to be adjudicated under the statute. I think Mr. Carter is mistaken in this position, for the reasons that I have set out in another part of this report. In view of the fact, therefore, that Mr. Carter does not show that he rendered any service whatever under his contract, I am unable to find that he is entitled to any fee thereunder.

The only other claim based on an approved contract is that of Joel L. Baugh, whose contract was dated February 14, 1894, and which provides for a fee of 1½ per cent. Mr. Baugh has submitted an affidavit showing that he is an Old Settler Cherokee, and that on June 20, 1891, the Old Settlers in council appointed him as an assistant commissioner to act as such in the aid of or in the place of Joel M. Bryan, their commissioner, in the prosecution, winding up, and final settlement of all matters appertaining to their claim against the Government. These council proceedings directed Mr. Bryan to enter into a contract with Mr. Baugh, otherwise there would have been no necessity for such a contract, and he might have been paid his fee if sufficient money remained out of the 25 per cent, in the same manner as Mr. Bryan, Mr. Hendricks, and Mr. Wilson, the Old Settlers' commissioners. This contract, however, was not made, as I have stated, until February 14, 1894.

Mr. Baugh's affidavit shows that he has been diligent in rendering services in assisting Mr. Bryan, who is his grandfather, in the prosecution of the case since his appointment both before and since the date of his contract, giving date and fact in detail of the services rendered by him since the contract; the other services, those rendered prior to the date of his contract, being stated in general terms.

I can not, however, conclude that the services rendered by him are worth 1½ per cent, or about $12,000, but will allow him three-fourths per cent, or $9,000, for said services.

This includes all of the claims that can be paid under contracts by the Department as I construe the law. There is one other claim which is especially provided for by an act of Congress dated August 15, 1894 (28 Stats., 31, Private Laws of the United States), an act to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay John T. Heard for professional services rendered the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians out of the funds of said Indians.

This act authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay to John T. Heard, for professional services rendered, out of any money appropriated, or to be appropriated, by Congress for the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians, by reason of a judgment rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of said Indians, the sum of $10,000, or such part thereof, if any, as shall remain of the 35 per cent set apart by resolution in various councils of the Old Settlers for the expense and prosecution of said claim after the ascertainment and determination of the amount of such fees and charges and other claims as are properly chargeable against said 35 per cent, provided that the Secretary shall first determine that the professional services were rendered to the Old Settlers and were contracted for in good faith by persons authorized to represent the Indians.

There are three things to determine in the adjudication of this claim: First, that there is sufficient of the 35 per cent set apart by the Old Settlers to defray the expenses of prosecuting this claim to pay the $10,000; second, that Mr. Heard rendered the professional services claimed; and third, that they were so rendered under a contract entered into in good faith by some one authorized on behalf of the Old Settlers to make such a contract.

If the Department should concur with me as to the amounts found in this report to be due the claimants, there would be left out of the 35 per cent set apart a little over 13 per cent, and therefore ample money to pay Mr. Heard's fee; and even if the Department should determine that anything is due and payable on account of the Peabody claim, and should Mr. Carter furnish the proof necessary to establish his claim under the statutes, there would still be left enough, and more than enough, to pay Mr. Heard's fee.

I think it is sufficiently shown by Mr. Heard's affidavit in his claim, and by all the papers and correspondence had with reference to the matter, that the services claimed to have been rendered by him were so rendered on behalf of the Old Settlers, and that these services were valuable and contributed largely to the ultimate recovery of the claim.

Attached to Mr. Heard's affidavit are several affidavits by prominent attorneys of this city, one of whom had personal knowledge of the amount and character of work performed by Mr. Heard, tending to show that the fee of $10,000 is a very reasonable compensation for those services.

It was satisfactorily shown by Mr. Heard, when he submitted his contract of July 25, 1893, to this office for approval, that he had rendered the services under contract with Mr. Bryan, who was authorized to make such contracts on behalf of the Indians. The Department will recall that this matter of Mr. Heard's fee was discussed in office reports of September 6, 1893, and January 2, 1894, and that the office was directed to prepare a bill, to be acted on by Congress, having in view the granting of authority to pay this claim. There is ample proof, therefore, in my opinion, that Mr. Heard rendered the services alleged, and that they were rendered under contract with a proper party, who had authority to represent the Indians in such matters, and I therefore see no reason why the claim should not be paid, and I find that he is entitled to receive $10,000, in accordance with the act for his relief.

A claim has been filed on behalf of the estate of John L. McCoy by Walter A. Duncan. Mr. Duncan bases the claim of the estate on Mr. McCoy's services as a commissioner for the Old Settlers. Mr. McCoy was one of the commissioners appointed in 1875, but served only about two years, and William H. Hendricks was appointed in his place. The estate claims for McCoy's services the same amount that has been paid to Mr. Hendricks and Mr. Wilson, Mr. Bryan's co-commissioners, who have been engaged in the prosecution of the case with him since 1878.

There was no provision made by the Old Settlers' council for the payment of any compensation to Mr. McCoy, and as Messrs. Wilson and Hendricks were paid their compensation under authority of the Old Settlers' council, I do not see how this Government can pay Mr. McCoy's estate anything, even if it were shown that his services during the two years were of such a valuable character that they entitled him to receive the compensation. The only remedy for Mr. McCoy's estate that I can see must be sought by the application to the council for the payment thereto of such amount as the council shall determine Mr. McCoy's services were worth. There is a fund of 2 per cent set apart for the payment of debts, out of which the claim of the estate might be in part paid, if it is just and right.

Another claim has been filed by the Cherokee Nation for $4,500, on account of moneys advanced by the said nation to the Old Settlers. This claim can not be paid by the Government, but must be paid by the Old Settlers' treasurer out of the fund set apart by the Indians to pay such debts. The Old Settlers' commissioners were required by the act of the Cherokee Nation to give bond for the repayment of this money, and the Old Settlers' treasurer, Mr. Bryan, is responsible to the Indians for the proper disbursement of the fund set apart for the payment of debts.

All the papers that have been filed in this office relating to these claims are herewith transmitted to you.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. M. BROWNING,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

EXHIBIT H.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, September 28, 1894.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 4th instant, transmitting an assignment to Mr. Sibbald of one-fifth interest in the contract of Mr. Wilshire with the Old Settler Cherokees, with request for instructions.

In response thereto I transmit herewith an opinion, dated the 27th instant, from the honorable Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior, in which I concur, and you will be governed in your action in this matter by the opinion herewith transmitted.

The papers accompanying your communication are returned, and those filed in the case are herewith transmitted.

Very respectfully,

WM. H. SIMS,
Acting Secretary.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Washington, September 27, 1894.

SIR: I have given attentive consideration to the claim of John A. Sibbald, esq., and to the questions in connection therewith presented in the communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated September 4, 1894, which on the 5th instant was referred to me by Acting Secretary Sims, with a request for an opinion thereon.

The matter has been orally argued by counsel for Mr. Sibbald and the estate of Mr. Wilshire, respectively.

The statement of facts in the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs renders it unnecessary for me to recite them.

The principal question on which my opinion is asked is as to whether the agreement of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians with Mr. Wilshire of September 28, 1886, is a renewal and extension of the agreement entered into between the same parties of July 1, 1882, or a separate and distinct contract between the parties thereto.

It appears from the papers presented that the original contract of employment was to continue for four years, it having been so limited in the approval indorsed thereon, and was approved by the Indian Office on October 9, 1882, and by the Department October 10, 1882.

This contract expired on July 1, 1886, and on September 28, 1886, the Old Settler Cherokees entered into a new contract with Mr. Wilshire, to continue for five years from the date thereof.

The first question that arises is, Can such a contract be revived and renewed after its expiration, and extended to cover the period intervening between its expiration and subsequent renewal and revival?

Upon this question I have only to say that the identical question was considered by Assistant Attorney-General Shields in the case of the renewal of the contract between the Old Settler Cherokees and W. S. Peabody, and answered in the affirmative (Fifty-second Congress, second session, Ex. Doc. No. 18, p. 476), and I see no reason to dissent from that opinion.

The question, then, is, Can the construction of the contract of September 28, 1886, contended for by Mr. Sibbald, that this contract is not a separate and distinct contract of employment, but a renewal and extension of the original contract of July 1, 1882, be maintained?

It is said in Professor Parsons's work on Contracts (vol. 2, p. 511): "No precise form of words is necessary even in a specialty. Thus words of recital in a deed will constitute an agreement between the parties on which an action of covenant may be maintained. And the recital in a deed of a previous agreement is equivalent to a confirmation and renewal of the agreement." And it is a rule of construction that the whole agreement is to be considered and such a meaning given to the particular parts as will, without violence to the words, be consistent with all the rest, and with the evident object and intention of the contracting parties. (Smith on Contracts, p. 543.)

That it was the intention of the parties when they executed the contract of September 28, 1886, that the original contract of July 1, 1882, should be revived and renewed by the new contract, I can not doubt, and I think that this intention is sufficiently manifested by the language they have employed.

The first recital in the contract of September 28, 1886, refers to the original employment of Mr. Wilshire under the contract of July 1, 1882; in the second, reference is made to the limitation of the original contract to the term of four years from its date; in the third, it is stated that Mr. Wilshire had faithfully performed his duty as attorney of the Old Settler Cherokees "up to the present" under the original contract, and in the last recital it is stated that it is the desire of the Old Settler Cherokees that Mr. Wilshire's employment as their attorney should be continued until their claim be finally disposed of.

The contract then sets out: "Therefore the said J. M. Bryan, etc., duly authorized by their general council for that purpose, doth hereby agree, for and on the part of said Indians, to and with said William W. Wilshire, to continue his said employment as the attorney for said Indians in the prosecution of their claim against the United States, etc., until the same shall be finally settled and disposed of, etc.; and in consideration thereof the said J. M. Bryan, etc., for and in behalf of said claimants, hereby agrees to pay, or cause to be paid, to the said William W. Wilshire, for his services in the prosecution and collection of said claim as aforesaid, a sum equal to 5 per cent of any and all sums that may be collected for said claimants from the United States: Provided, that said compensation shall be in full of all demands of the said Wilshire for any and all services rendered by him at any time for said Indians. And the said William W. Wilshire, for and in consideration of the promise and agreement of said Indians as aforesaid, hereby agrees to continue his services as the attorney of said Indians," etc. Then follows an agreement as to continuance of the contract for five years from and after the date thereof.

Not only in the recitals of the contract under consideration is there an evident intention to connect the employment of Mr. Wilshire under the new contract with his previous employment under the original contract and to continue it, but in the contracting part it is explicitly stated that it is the desire of the Old Settler Cherokees to continue Mr. Wilshire's employment as their attorney.

And I can see no reason for the proviso, unless the new contract was intended to embrace a compensation for the services rendered under the original contract, and by inference to continue it.

The last question upon which I am called for an expression of opinion, to wit, whether the indorsement on the contract of July 1, 1882, assigning one-fifth interest therein to Mr. Sibbald, is a valid assignment, and can be approved at this time, so as to authorize the payment to him of one-fifth of such sum as may be found due to Mr. Wilshire's estate, for services rendered by Mr. Wilshire under the contract of July 1, 1882, must, I think, be answered in the affirmative.

The provision relative to assignments of contracts with Indians is found in section 2106, Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads:

"SEC. 2106. No assignment of any contracts embraced by section twenty-one hundred and three, or any part of one, shall be valid, unless the names of the assignees and their residences and occupations be entered in writing upon the contract and the consent of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to such assignment be also endorsed thereon."

The assignment to Mr. Sibbald, indorsed on the contract of July 1, 1882, complies with the requirements of the statute, and needs only the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

As the contract of 1886 was, in my opinion, merely an extension of the time limit in the contract of 1882, I am unable to see any valid reason against the approval now of the assignment to Mr. Sibbald of an interest in the contract of 1882.

If all the facts in respect of Mr. Sibbald's connection with these contracts have been submitted to me, the approval of the assignment will, in my opinion, give to him the same interest in the renewal or extension contract that he had in the original.

I therefore answer the questions submitted in the affirmative.

Very respectfully,

JOHN I. HALL,
Assistant Attorney-General.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Approved.

WM. H. SIMS, Acting Secretary.

EXHIBIT I.

In the matter of the claims for attorneys' fees, etc., in the case of the Old Settler Cherokees vs. United States.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 22, 1895.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your communication of November 21, 1894, submitting for the decision of the Department the claims of attorneys and others for services on account of the claim of the Western or Old Settler Cherokee Indians against the United States Government.

At the request of the counsel for the parties an oral discussion was had before the Secretary. Counsel were fully heard and their arguments have been carefully considered. It is only necessary very concisely to recite the facts:

An appropriation was made by a clause in the general deficiency act approved August 23, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 424, 451), to pay a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of the Old Settlers or Western Cherokees as follows, viz:

"The Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians, by Joel M. Bryan, William Wilson, and William H. Hendricks, commissioners; and Joel M. Bryan, treasurer, and so forth, eight hundred thousand three hundred and eighty-six dollars and thirty-one cents; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is directed to withhold from distribution among said Indians only so much of that part of the said judgment set apart by said Indians to pay the expenses, and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of said prosecution."

The claim which this appropriation was intended to satisfy had been pending for many years. In 1875 the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians appointed commissioners or agents to prosecute the claim, setting apart for defraying the expenses of such prosecution 35 per cent of whatever sum might be recovered by the Indians on account of their claim. Out of this 35 per cent the commissioners were authorized to employ legal counsel and attorneys, and to pay for their services and for other expenses incident to the prosecution of the claim. Subsequent to the setting aside of this percentage, the Indians at various times made specific appropriations therefrom for different purposes, as follows, viz:

"For J. M. Bryan, commissioner and treasurer, 6½ per cent; for William H. Hendricks, commissioner, 2 per cent; for William Wilson, commissioner, 2 per cent; for payment of debts of Old Settlers, money borrowed from Cherokee Nation, 2 per cent."

Certain contracts with attorneys, made by the commissioners or agents, received the approval of your office and of the Secretary of the Interior, viz:

"W. W. Wiltshire, 5 per cent; W. S. Peabody, 8 per cent; E. J. Ellis (conditional), 2 per cent; Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot, 4 per cent; Garland & May, for a fee of $15,000 (conditional); C. M. Carter, a conditional fee; Joel L. Baugh (conditional), 1½ per cent."

It further appears that since the appropriation was made the following claims have been paid: September 6, 1894, to J. M. Bryan, 6½ per cent, $52,025.11; September 8, 1894, to William Wilson, 2 per cent, $16,007.72; September 8, 1894, to William H. Hendricks, 2 per cent. $16,007.72; total, $84,040.55; that claims of attorneys for services were adjudicated by your office under section 2104 of the Revised Statutes and transmitted to the Department for its action as follows: August 31, 1894, claim of Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot, 4 per cent, $32,015.45; September 5, 1894, claim of Garland & May, 1½ per cent, $15,000; total $47,075.45.

These claims, as well as the claim of John T. Heard for $10,000, and of the Wilshire estate for $13,500, hereinafter referred to, have been approved by the Department by letter of January 5, 1895.

It further appears that claims were filed in your office by attorneys and parties, including those whose claims have been paid, as follows, viz: J. M. Bryan, 6½ per cent; William Wilson, 2 per cent; William H. Hendricks, 2 per cent; J. M. Bryan (treasurer), 2 per cent; Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot, 4 per cent; Garland & May (about) 1½ per cent; W. W. Wilshire, 1½ per cent; W. S. Peabody, 8 per cent; D. A. McKnight, for estate of E. J. Ellis, 2 per cent; C. M. Carter (about) three-eighths per cent; Joel L. Baugh, 1½ per cent; John T. Heard, 1½ per cent; J. W. Douglas, five-eighths per cent; S. O. Hemingway, five-eighths per cent; John L. McCoy, 2 per cent; Richard C. Wintersmith, 25 per cent; Belva A. Lockwood, 10 per cent; J. J. Newall, 2½ per cent.

It further appears that the contracts made with the commissioners of the Old Settler Cherokees, and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, were executed and approved in conformity to the provisions of the Revised Statutes (sec. 2103).

When these contracts were so approved by the Secretary of the Interior, it being supposed that the Old Settler Cherokees were an Indian community, endowed with a capacity to act collectively, the contracts were not made with the individual members of that part of the Cherokee Nation known as the "Old Settler" or "Western" Cherokees, but with commissioners appointed by a council or convention of the Old Settler Cherokees.

Section 2103 of the Revised Statutes provides, among other things, that contracts with Indians shall contain the names of all parties in interest, their residence and occupation, and if made with a tribe by their tribal authority, the scope of authority, and the reason for exercising that authority, shall be given specifically. It also provides that the judge before whom such contract or agreement is executed shall certify officially the time when and place where such contract or agreement was executed, and that it was in his presence, and who are the interested parties thereto as stated to him at the time; the parties present making the same; the source and extent of authority claimed at the time by the contracting parties to make the contract or agreement, and whether made in person or by agent or attorney of either party or parties.

The contracts under consideration were not executed by the individual Indians comprising the Western Cherokees; they did not contain the names of the parties in interest, who were the individual Indians, but of the commissioners of the Old Settler Cherokees, who, it now appears, had no capacity to act collectively.

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, delivering the opinion of the court in United States vs. Old Settlers (148 U. S. R., 427, 478), said:

"The question remains as to the character in which petitioners came into court, and to whom the amount awarded should be distributed.

"The Old Settlers or Western Cherokees are not a governmental body politic, nor have they a corporate existence, nor any capacity to act collectively. The money belongs to them as individual members of an Indian community, recognized as such by the treaty of 1846, and treated as distinct and separate from the Cherokee Nation, so far as necessary, to enable the Government to accord them their treaty rights. They are described in the fourth article of the treaty as all those Cherokees west of the Mississippi who emigrated prior to the treaty of 1835; and they might be held to include those now living who so emigrated, together with the descendants of those who have died, the succession to be determined by the Cherokee law. The petition does not set forth their names, nor the extent of the rights and interests claimed, respectively, but purports to be brought by three persons, for themselves and as commissioners of the Western Cherokees; and they alleged that the claimants are the remaining part of those Cherokee Indians who formed and composed the Western Cherokee Nation, and that they have maintained their separate organization so far as to adjust and settle their claims against the United States. But the evidence is quite inadequate to justify the court in treating the immediate petitioners as appointed by all the beneficiaries as their agents to receive and disburse the amount awarded."

Under these circumstances, valuable services having been rendered to the Old Settler Cherokees, both under contracts supposed to be valid under the provisions of the Revised Statutes, designed for the protection of the Indians from improvident agreements and contracts, and under agreements made with the Indians, but not strictly within the rigid requirements of the Revised Statutes, which gave just and equitable claims on the Old Settler Cherokees, for professional services in the prosecution of their claims, the act of Congress, making the appropriation to pay the judgment in favor of the Old Settler Cherokees, provided that "the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is directed to withhold from distribution among said Indians only so much of that part of the said judgment set apart by said Indians to pay the expenses, and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of said prosecution."

What construction should be put upon this provision? I am of opinion that it was intended to vest the Commissioner of Indian Affairs with the same power to adjust the claims of attorneys for professional services that a court of equity possesses in passing upon claims for legal services.

It is seen that according to the decision of the Supreme Court these Indians had no power to act collectively; and it being well known that there were claims for valuable professional services rendered to them in the prosecution of their claim against the United States which were not in exact conformity to the provisions of the Revised Statutes, Congress plainly intended that claims for professional services should be adjusted without reference to the Revised Statutes, which, if applied to the case, would deprive every claimant of his merited reward, but upon those principles which would govern a court of equity in like circumstances.

But it is urged by the counsel for the Indians that the words in the appropriation act, "and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of said prosecution," were added ex abundanti cautela, lest the decision of the Supreme Court in Old Settlers vs. United States, supra, should "give trouble to those gentlemen who had for several years, under approved contracts, devoted their professional ability, time, and labor continuously and faithfully to this case."

In reply to this argument it is sufficient to say that if that was the intention of Congress it has been very unhappy in its choice of terms to express its meaning. But the argument is entirely gratuitous.

The language used clearly indicates an intention to place no other limit upon the power of the Secretary of the Interior to adjudicate these claims than that they shall not exceed the 35 per cent set apart by the Indians, and that they shall be just and equitable, according to the rules which govern courts of equity in such cases.

After this statement of my general views on the subject, I shall do no more than state in a few words my conclusions upon the claims presented.

The claims of Messrs. Bryan, Hendricks & Wilson have been paid, and the claims of Messrs. Jones, Voorhees & Boudinot, Messrs. Garland & May, Mr. John T. Heard, and the Wilshire estate have been approved, as above stated, and now require no consideration.

The claim of John A. Sibbald.—I do not think that Mr. Sibbald is entitled to anything more than one-fifth of the amount allowed on the Wilshire claim, in accordance with his agreement with Mr. Wilshire.

The claim of W. S. Peabody.—Upon this claim I am of opinion that Mr. Peabody's acceptance of employment under the Government of the United States can not be considered an abandonment of his contract. The proof filed shows that he performed very valuable services during a period of many years, extending from the year 1878 to the close of the case. I have carefully considered his claim, and I can not think that, however valuable and meritorious these services may have been, he is entitled to the enormous sum at which he rates them. I agree with you that the sum of $8,000 would be ample compensation for all the services rendered; and that sum is allowed.

The claim of E. J. Ellis.—The proof shows that this claim is of the most meritorious character. To be sure, the services of Mr. Ellis were not of long duration, for he died a few months after he was employed in the case. I do not think, under the circumstances, that the representatives of Mr. Ellis are entitled to a very considerable compensation for his services. I think, however, that the compensation suggested by you is quite inadequte. I am of opinion that the estate of Mr. Ellis should be allowed the sum of $4,000 in full for his services.

I do not see any merit in the claim set up by Mr. McKnight, as the surviving partner of the law firm of Ellis, Johns & McKnight, and his claim is rejected.

The claim of C. M. Carter.—Mr. Carter's legal services extended from the latter part of 1883 to the year 1893; they are fully recognized by Mr. Bryan, who swears in his affidavit on file that the Old Settler Cherokees were benefited to the full extent of the amount agreed to be paid to Mr. Carter for his legal services; that he has advanced $213 to pay costs in their case. I am satisfied that Mr. Carter is justly entitled to be paid the full amount of his claim for legal services, viz, $3,185, and that sum is allowed. The claim for $333 advanced by him to Mr. Bryan can not be paid out of this fund.

The claim of Joel L. Baugh.—I am unable to see what services Mr. Baugh has rendered which would justify the payment to him of the sum of $3,000. His services may have been valuable, but it is not easy to perceive just exactly what they were. But, under all the circumstances, I would approve an allowance to him of the sum of $1,000.

The claim of John W. Douglas.—Mr. Douglas was employed as one of the attorneys of these Indians in the Court of Claims in the early part of 1884, and until the year 1889, when he was appointed one of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. His services were valuable and meritorious, and the compensation which he asks is moderate, viz, the sum of $2,500, which is allowed.

The claim of S. O. Hemingway.—In 1886 Mr. Hemingway was employed by Mr. Bryan to assist the other counsel in the prosecution of the claim of the Old Settlers, and appears from his affidavit to have performed meritorious services in their behalf, which are therein detailed. I do not understand that this is denied, but it is said that his contract was not properly executed and approved under the Revised Statutes, which is true; but I think his services were meritorious, and that he should receive a reasonable compensation for them, and a fee of $1,500 is allowed.

The claim of John L. McCoy.—This is a claim filed in behalf of the administratrix of John L. McCoy, deceased, who was for a short time a commissioner for the Old Settlers. It appears that he was appointed in 1875 and served about two years. I am unable to see what claim Mr. McCoy has upon this fund, and I agree with you in its rejection.

The claim of Richard C. Wintersmith.—This claim was rejected by you. I am unable to discover any contract under section 2103 or otherwise upon which he can predicate a claim. His power of attorney was signed by Keys, McCoy, and Scales, none of whom were authorized at the time to represent the Old Settlers; besides, the proof of his services is so indefinite that a claim could scarcely be based upon it.

The claim of James J. Newell.—Mr. Newell is certainly entitled to be paid for the services which his proofs show that he rendered. They were of the most meritorious character. He was one of the pioneers in the prosecution of the claim. He largely contributed to lay the foundation on which ultimate success depended. He labored and other men entered into his labors.

The beneficial character of his services is shown by the affidavits on file in your office. It was principally owing to his efforts that the agencies were brought into activity which eventuated in final success.

It is upon the contract acknowledged in the city of Washington on the 8th day of January, 1877, by Mr. Bryan in his own right and as delegated attorney for Messrs. Wilson and Hendricks, his cocommissioners, that Mr. Newell relies as evidence of his employment as attorney for these Indians to prosecute their claim. The value of these services was recognized by the Indians by the adoption of the resolutions unanimously adopted by the council held October 13, 1882, set out in the report of the House Committee on Indian Affairs. (House Ex. Doc., Fiftieth Congress, first session, Report No. 342, p. 18.)

But it is said that by his contract Mr. Newell was only to be paid in the event of his securing payment to the Old Settlers of their claim; that his fee was entirely contingent upon his success; if he failed he was to receive nothing.

Now, what is the language of the contract? "And we do hereby agree and contract with the said J. J. Newell to pay him for his services as attorney a sum equal to eight per cent of the amount which may be allowed or recovered on said claim, the payment of which is hereby made a lien upon the said claim, and is to be paid out of the said thirty-five per cent set apart by the convention as aforesaid." Did that make Mr. Newell's fee entirely dependent upon his success? It certainly made his fee dependent upon the recovery of the claim, but he was to be paid for his services as the attorney for the Indians. If he had abandoned the employment before the recovery of the claim, he would have forfeited his right to compensation. That is the law governing all contracts.

It is then said that "he abandoned fully and absolutely, in 1883, all efforts in behalf of the Old Settlers. He refused to keep his contract with the Old Settlers, and by so doing he compelled the Old Settlers to employ additional and other attorneys to secure the payment of their claim, which Mr. Newell admits that he was employed to do for the compensation in his contract, and which he admits he did not do."

There is no evidence that Mr. Newell abandoned the employment; on the contrary, it appears that in the latter part of the year 1882 he applied to the Indians, through Mr. John L. McCoy, who had been one of their commissioners, for a renewal of his contract with Messrs. Bryan, Wilson & Hendricks, and that in a council held October 18, 1882, the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved further, That the proposition of J. J. Newell, made through John L. McCoy to us, to renew any contract made by said McCoy or any Old Settler Cherokee commissioner or commissioners, is hereby rejected."

The Indians then employed other counsel in place of Mr. Newell.

The conduct of one party to a contract, which prevents the other from performing his part, is an excuse for nonperformance. (United States vs. Peck, 102 U. S. R., 64.)

The sum of $10,000 would, I think, be a just compensation, and is allowed.

The claim of Mrs. Belva A. Lockwood.—Mrs. Lockwood's claim can not be recognized as an original claim upon the fund. It appears, however, that Mrs. Lockwood has an agreement with Mr. J. J. Newell (which is filed with her claim) by which it was agreed that the fees which should be received by Mr. Newell under his contract with the commissioners of the Old Settler Cherokees should be divided into three equal portions, of which she should be entitled to one portion.

I agree with you that the claim filed by the Cherokee Nation for $4,500, on account of moneys advanced by them to the Old Settler Cherokees, can not be paid out of this fund.

The claim of Stephen W. Parker.—This claim was referred to me by your letter of January 9, 1895. I am unable to discover any merit in it. Mr. Parker does not appear to have had any contract with the Indians or their commissioners, formal or informal, nor am I able, from the statement in Mr. Parker's petition, to understand what are the professional services for which he claims compensation. The claim is consequently rejected.

This disposes of all the claims submitted to me.

The papers accompanying your communication of November 11, 1894, are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 9, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith for your consideration a letter addressed to you by Samuel C. Dunham, under date of December 13, 1894, and filed in this office on the 24th day of the same month, inclosing affidavits of himself and Reese H. Voorhees in support of his claim for services as stenographer in connection with the Old Settler or Western Cherokee claim against the United States, amounting to $545.30, in accordance with the terms of a contract made between Joel M. Bryan, on behalf of the Old Settlers, and the said Samuel C. Dunham, dated March 15, 1892, as shown on page 705, Senate Ex. Doc. No. 13, Fifty-second Congress, second session.

Although the services referred to were rendered prior to the date of the contract, thereby rendering it impossible for this office to approve said services so as to allow payment for the same under said contract, there seems to be no reasonable doubt that the services were actually rendered, or that the compensation allowed by the contract is reasonable. I therefore respectfully recommend that authority be granted for the payment to Mr. Samuel C. Dunham for said stenographic services in the sum of $545.30, and that the office be instructed to state an account for the same, to be referred to the accounting officers of the Treasury for payment from the appropriation "Judgment in favor of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians."

Very respectfully,

THOS. P. SMITH,
Acting Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

EXHIBIT K.

In the matter of the claim of Samuel C. Dunham, filed in the Indian Office on the 24th of December, 1894. Old Settler Cherokees case.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 15, 1895.

SIR: On the 2d of April last you referred to me for consideration the claim of Samuel C. Dunham for compensation for services as stenographer in connection with the Old Settler Cherokees' claim against the United States, amounting to $545.30.

These services appear to have been rendered in accordance with a contract made with Joel M. Bryan on behalf of the Old Settlers, and are shown by the affidavit of Reese H. Voorhees, esq., counsel for the Old Settlers, to have been for reporting the arguments made in the Court of Claims in the trial of the Old Settler case in that court for the purpose of preserving them for further use in their case against the United States.

Mr. Voorhees swears that the work was done under his personal observation and fully met the requirements of his employment and contract, and Mr. Voorhees thinks the charges for his services reasonable and just. The claim is also supported by the affidavit of claimant. You recommend that authority be granted for its payment, and that your office be instructed to state an account for the same, to be referred to the accounting officers of the Treasury for payment from the appropriation "Judgment in favor of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians."

I think the claim is just, and should be paid as one of the debts incurred in the prosecution of the Old Settlers claim. It is therefore approved. The papers transmitted with your office letter are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

EXHIBIT L.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 21, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith for your consideration the application of J. M. Bryan, as treasurer of the Old Settler Cherokees, through his attorney, Joel M. Baugh, for the 2 per cent of the sum appropriated under act of August 23, 1894, for the benefit of the Old Settler Cherokees, amounting to $16,007.72.

This 2 per cent of whatever sum might be secured to the Old Settler Cherokees through Congress was set aside by a council of said Indians assembled in 1884, a report of the proceedings of which, duly approved, is herewith inclosed, for the payment of debts contracted and expenses incurred by them in securing said appropriation, to be disbursed by their treasurer, J. M. Bryan.

I would therefore respectfully recommend that the said application for this 2 per cent receive the approval of the Department, and that authority be granted this office to forward the same to the treasurer for payment.

Very respectfully,

D. M. BROWNING, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

EXHIBIT M.

In the matter of the claim of Joel M. Bryan, filed in the Indian Office February 16, 1895. Old Settler Cherokees case.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, May 18, 1895.

SIR: With your letter of February 21, 1895, you transmitted for my consideration the application of Joel M. Bryan, as treasurer of the Old Settler Cherokees, for 2 per cent of the sum appropriated under the act of August 23, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 424, 451), to pay the judgment of the Court of Claims, as modified by the decision of the Supreme Court in United States v. Old Settlers (148 U. S. R., 427).

Before considering this claim, it is proper to refer to the resolution passed by the Senate of the United States on the 2d of March, 1895. The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to withhold any further distribution and payment out of the money derived from thirty-five per cent of the judgment in favor of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians against the United States in the sum of eight hundred thousand three hundred and eighty-six dollars and thirty-one cents, set apart for the payment of expenses and for legal services justly and equitably payable on account of the prosecution of said claim, until otherwise authorized by law, except allowances already made for legal services, and to report to the Senate any and all payments and distributions from said fund already made, with copies of all papers in any manner connected with said payments and distributions filed in the Interior Department and the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the action had thereon."

While a resolution passed by either branch of the Congress of the United States is entitled to great respect, in so far as the Secretary of the Interior is directed by this resolution of the Senate to withhold from distribution and payment that part of the $800,386.31 appropriated by the act of August 23, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 424, 451), set apart by these Indians to pay the expenses and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of the prosecution of their claim against the Government of the United States. I can not think that the Senate possesses the power under the Constitution to interfere with a Department of the executive government in the performance of a duty imposed upon it by an act of Congress, involving the payment of private claims which may be found to be justly due. If I had any doubts on the subject the opinion of Mr. Attorney-General Hoar (13 Opin. Atty. Gen., 113) would serve to dispel them.

In the case of the new Idria Mining Company, submitted to him for his opinion by the Secretary of the Interior, he said:

"If, as I understand the New Idria Mining Company are prepared to establish, to the satisfaction of your Department, their claim under the statute of 1860, chapter 362 (14 Stat. L., 251), to receive a patent for certain lands in California, they have a legal right to have the question of their claim to such patent passed upon, such that your Department is bound to consider and determine the same, notwithstanding the request of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives for a suspension of action. Their claim, as I understand it, is of a title to land created by law. If under the law they have this title, and are prepared to furnish the proofs of it, the law gives the right to a patent, and the issuing of a patent is not made discretionary with the executive officers of the Government. The question, then, resolves itself into this, whether, when a right is created by law and a duty devolved upon an Executive Department under the same law, the enjoyment or enforcement of such right can be suspended at the request of a committee of the House of Representatives.

"I am unable to see that this result could be attained by any action even of the whole House of Representatives or of both branches of Congress, unless by a change in the law itself. To deprive any person of a right which the law creates at the request of anybody would be a novel idea under a system of government which is supposed to be a government of laws and not of men. If it were a subject depending upon your discretion, where you might properly regard all the equities of the case, and the probability that a decision at one time or another might affect them favorably or otherwise, the probability that Congress would take material action upon the question involved might well have an important influence in determining your action, and the suggestion of a committee of Congress, or its chairman, would be justly entitled to great respect. But it can not be that any person can rightfully be hindered in the enjoyment of his legal rights upon the suggestion of a possibility that the law may at some time or other be changed."

It appears by the papers submitted that this 2 per cent of whatever sum might be secured to the Old Settlers was set aside by a council of the Old Settlers assembled in 1884, for the payment of debts contracted and expenses incurred by them in securing their claims against the Government of the United States, to be disbursed by their treasurer, Joel M. Bryan.

The action of this council can not be recognized as conclusive evidence in support of claims against these Indians, for the reason that they are not an Indian community, endowed with the capacity to act collectively. (See my letter to you of January 22, 1895.) Under the authority given in the act of August 23, 1894, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs "to withhold from distribution among said Indians only so much of that part of said judgment set apart by said Indians to pay expenses and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of said prosecution," all claims and debts incurred in the prosecution of their claims should be paid when properly verified. But, with the exception of the debt of $4,500 due to the Cherokee Nation for money loaned to the Old Settler Indians, Mr. Bryan has furnished no evidence of such indebtedness. He should be required to furnish an itemized account, with vouchers, and such claims for expenses as are properly verified should be allowed.

The claim of the Cherokee Nation was rejected by my letter of January 22, 1895, upon the recommendation contained in your letter of March 21, 1894. But it should be paid out of the fund retained for the payment of expenses to the Cherokee Nation directly or to its constituted agent upon a release being filed in your office and proof that the moneys borrowed were expended for expenses properly incurred in the prosecution of the claim of the Indians.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

EXHIBIT N.

MEMORANDUM.

Claims of attorneys in appropriation to pay claim of Old Settler or Western Cherokees.

[Prepared in the Indian Office for use in their discussion.]

The act making appropriations to pay the Old Settler or Western Cherokee claim (Public, No. 202) directs the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to withhold from distribution among the Indians only so much of that part of the judgment set apart by the Indians for the prosecution of their claims as is necessary for him to pay the expenses and for legal services justly or equitably payable on account of said prosecution.

This memorandum is prepared on the assumption that no attorney is entitled, either legally or equitably, to payment of any fees unless his contract was a lawful and valid contract and alive at the date of the recovery on behalf of the Indians, and he can show services that conduced to such recovery in accordance with section 2104 of the Revised Statutes.

No contract between an Indian tribe and an attorney would be lawful or valid so as to authorize the payment of a fee to the attorney unless it had received the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, as required in section 2103 of the Revised Statutes. Where an attorney had a lawful and valid contract which expired by limitation (the statute requires that all Indian contracts shall be limited as to time or duration), and which has not been renewed, he will not be entitled, either legally or equitably, to any fee for such services as he may have rendered under such expired contract.

Attorneys have filed claims for fee in this case as follows:

1. Betsa A. Lockwood and J. J. Newell.—These claimants appear from the papers filed to base their claims on unapproved contracts with Jim Taylor and others as representatives of the Western North Carolina Cherokee Indians.

The contracts were not approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and it is perhaps not necessary to discuss the merits of the claims. However, I will state that it does not appear from the records or files of this office that Jim Taylor, or any of the other parties signing the contract with Mrs. Lockwood, was ever an authorized representative of the Old Settlers, except McCoy, who appears to have been a commissioner of the Old Settlers during the year 1875 and a part of 1876, and as Mrs. Lockwood's contract was made in 1885, it was at a time when McCoy was without authority to act in the matter. The council proceedings authorizing the appointment of the attorneys in fact who made the contract with Mrs. Lockwood was designated by the clerk of the council in his affidavit as "the convention of Western North Carolina Cherokee Indians."

This convention would have no power to authorize the employment of an attorney to represent the Old Settlers, and it would appear that Mrs. Lockwood would not be entitled to the fee she claims.

Mrs. Lockwood admits, on page 3 of her statement of May 18, 1894, that the Eastern Cherokees appointed delegates to prosecute their claim and the claim of the Old Settlers, and her contract was executed by these delegates.

Furthermore, if the contract were one under which Mrs. Lockwood would be otherwise entitled to pay, she would not be entitled for the reason that the contract under which she claims expired by limitation April 23, 1890, and was not renewed. The failure to renew could be construed in but two ways, namely, Mrs. Lockwood either voluntarily abandoned the service or was dismissed the service by the Indians. As all contracts with Indians for contingent compensation contemplate the recovery on the claims to which they relate, no attorney who has failed to accomplish the purpose of his contract has the right, on account of services rendered without result, to demand a fee or the continuance of his employment by the Indians. The Indians having the right to refuse to keep in their employ an unprofitable attorney, the results of their refusal to renew Mrs. Lockwood's contract would be the same as her voluntary abandonment of the service, namely, to deprive her of any right to demand or receive the fee provided therein.

Mrs. Lockwood, who is also prosecuting Mr. Newell's claim, does not appear to have filed the contract under which he claims, and, as it was never approved by this office, it is not of record here. It is impossible, therefore, to determine what it provided. As, however, it expired long before any recovery was had in behalf of the Indians, he would not be entitled to the fee, especially as the Old Settlers in 1882 expressly refused to renew his contract.

In connection with these two claims attention is invited to Department letter of January 23, 1886 (2453, 1886).

Messrs. Marble and Hazleton have filed a brief in the J. J. Newell claim, with affidavits, but, as his right is dependent upon a question of law, no material difference is made in the case.

2. J. W. Douglas, attorney for G. L. Douglas.—There is no formal contract on which to base this claim. The claimant seeks his fee under a letter of March 20, 1884, from Mr. Bryan to J. W. Douglas, advising him that Messrs. Wilshire and Heard had informed him (Bryan) that they desired said J. W. Douglas to assist them in the case, and that said Douglas would do so for $5,000; therefore Bryan agreed to pay him the $5,000 if he would render the services desired.

This letter is not even formally accepted by Mr. Douglas, who assigned it to his son on taking office under Mr. Harrison's Administration. He was District Commissioner.

It would seem that there is no lawful authority for this office to pay Mr. Douglas's claim. He might, however, have his remedy against Mr. Bryan, as to which, however, there is some doubt in view of the statute on the question of Indian-attorney contracts.

3. John L. McCoy's estate.—The estate of John L. McCoy makes claim for $16,000 on account of services alleged to have been rendered by McCoy as a commissioner of the Old Settler or Western Cherokees in 1875-76. This claim is one with which the Government has no concern, in view of the fact that the Old Settlers did not, by any of their councils, provide for Mr. McCoy's compensation, as they did in the case of Wilson, Hendricks, and Bryan. If Mr. McCoy rendered the services claimed, his estate should apply to the council of the Old Settlers, who may, if his claim is deemed a proper one and there is sufficient money remaining of that set apart for the payment of debts of the Old Settlers, direct the treasurer to pay the claim.

4. O. M. Carter.—The first six contracts mentioned in the affidavit of Mr. Carter were never approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, as required by section 2103 of the Revised Statutes, and were not, therefore, valid contracts.

The seventh contract provides in its terms for payment for services rendered prior to its date, as well as for services to be rendered subsequently thereto. Mr. Carter was advised, in a letter of February 21, 1893, that his contract could not be approved for services rendered prior to its date, and that it would be impossible for this Department to authorize the payment of any fee to him on account of services rendered on account of any alleged former contract (see Opinions Atty. Gen., vol. 18, p. 517) which had not received the approvals required by the law; but that it could be approved to authorize him to render services thereunder after its date and to receive proper compensation therefor, and that if he would indicate his desire to that effect it would be approved to that extent. He informally asked for its approval as indicated, and it was so stated in a report of February 28, 1893, to the Secretary, submitting the contract approved in the following language:

"The within contract is hereby approved so that payment may be made for such services only as may be rendered by the attorney thereunder after the date thereof."

Mr. Carter's affidavit shows services rendered under his old (so-called) contracts, but it is not sufficient, under the statute, to show services under the contract of February, 1893. The alleged contracts not having been approved can not be taken into consideration, and any service rendered thereunder was at his own risk.

He should be called upon to make proof under the approved contract only, and in accordance with section 2104.

5. Richard C. Wintersmith.—The claim of Mr. Wintersmith was filed by Hon. Phil. B. Thompson, who has a power of attorney to represent him therein. It is based on a power of attorney given in 1873 by Riley Keys, J. A. Scales, and John L. McCoy, and which provides for the payment to said Wintersmith of 25 per cent of whatever amount the Indians might recover on the claim, in consideration for services said Wintersmith might render as attorney for said Indians. This power of attorney is not signed by Mr. Wintersmith and was never approved by this office and the Interior Department. It is not a legal contract, and Mr. Wintersmith can not therefore be paid.

In addition to the fact that the contract was not a legal one, Mr. Wintersmith showed no service on behalf of the Indians further than to say that from November 29, 1873, when he was appointed by the parties above named as attorney, to the present time, which embraces twenty years, he has labored as their attorney.

6. Cherokee Nation.—The Cherokee Nation files its claim for $4,500 against the Old Settler Cherokees for money loaned said Old Settlers in 1875 and 1882.

This claim is a matter with which the Interior Department has no concern, inasmuch as the Old Settler council has appointed a treasurer to disburse the money which was set apart for the payment of debts, which money should be paid over to the treasurer and he should be held accountable to the council therefor.

7. E. John Ellis.—This claim is based on a contract entered into December 15, 1888, between the late E. John Ellis and Mr. Bryan, as Old Settler commissioner and treasurer. This contract was not filed in this office for approval until 1892, some time after the death of Mr. Ellis, which occurred in April, 1889. It was approved by this office March 2, and by the Department March 3, 1893. It provided for the payment to Mr. Ellis of a fee equal to 2 per cent of the amount recovered to the Indians on the claim, and stipulated for his employment to prosecute, as attorney of record, the suit against the United States on behalf of the Old Settlers.

The contract was filed in this office by Mr. D. A. McKnight, who was a member of the firm of Ellis, Johns & McKnight. Mr. McKnight claimed that the contract was a firm contract, notwithstanding it was made with Mr. Ellis personally; and after Mr. Ellis's death Mr. McKnight offered to continue the prosecution of the claim on behalf of the firm. His offer, however, was declined by Mr. Bryan, through his attorneys, Messrs. Jones & Voorhees, and he filed letters from Hon. S. W. Peel and Hon. H. L. Dawes in support of the claim that during the period between December 15, 1888, and April, 1889, Mr. Ellis rendered valuable service in behalf of the Old Settlers. They submit, as a part of the record in the case, copy of a petition which was filed in the Court of Claims at the beginning of the suit, and which was signed by Mr. Ellis as attorney of record in the case; and both Mr. McKnight and Mr. Johns (the latter of whom is now deceased) filed affidavits relative to the making of the contract and services rendered by Mr. Ellis.

On the other hand, Mr. Bryan filed several affidavits in this office tending to show that Mr. Ellis did not do anything whatever in the prosecution of the claim of the Old Settlers. One of his affidavits is made by Hon. J. W. Douglas, whose claim is discussed in another part of this memorandum, and who makes oath to the fact in this case that he, with Messrs. Jones & Voorhees, met Mr. Ellis in the office of said Jones & Voorhees in 1889, the object of which meeting was to discuss the institution of the prosecution of the claim of the Old Settlers in the courts under the act of February 25, 1889; that at said meeting Messrs. Jones & Voorhees suggested and urged the adoption of a plan upon which to prosecute the claim, involving considerable novelty as compared with the plan pursued under the Bowman Act, and that because of its novelty it received considerable criticism and discussion; that after the plan had been fully explained and the objections thereto answered, it was agreed to by all present, and Messrs. Jones & Voorhees were requested to prepare a petition embodying the same, and a second meeting was agreed upon to consider the petition when so prepared; that in accordance with this agreement, Jones & Voorhees prepared the petition, called the attorneys together when it was completed, presented said petition to them, and Mr. Ellis, having been selected by the attorneys as attorney of record, signed it as such.

This affidavit is to meet the claim of Mr. McKnight that Mr. Ellis prepared the petition which he signed.

An affidavit by Hon. John T. Heard, to practically the same effect as that of Mr. Douglas, was also filed by Messrs. Jones & Voorhees as attorneys for Mr. Bryan.

Mr. Joel L. Baugh makes affidavit to the fact that he thoroughly and carefully examined all papers which were before the Committees on Indian Affairs in the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States in the claim of the Old Settler Cherokees during the Fiftieth Congress, and which are now in the files of Congress. Among said papers are briefs and other papers signed by attorneys in the case, but there is no paper of any character whatsoever on file in said claim bearing the name of the late E. John Ellis, and no evidence whatever of the fact of Ellis having ever appeared before the committee in connection with the claim.

Mr. Bryan makes an affidavit in answer to the claim of Mr. McKnight that Mr. Ellis did service before the passage of the bill authorizing the Court of Claims to adjudicate this bill, in which he states that at the date of his employment of Mr. Ellis the work necessary to, and which in fact did secure, the passage of the bill had been done.

The papers in this case are voluminous and affidavits on both sides are positive. If the assignees of Mr. Ellis's estate can show that any service was rendered by him under his contract, his estate would be entitled to compensation on account of the fact that he was prevented by death from carrying out the provisions of his contract and the abandonment of the service was involuntary.

8. W. S. Peabody.—This claim is based on a contract between said Peabody and the Old Settler Cherokees made December 9, 1882, and renewed December 6, 1886, and February 10, 1892. Of this contract Mr. Peabody has assigned three-eighths of the compensation provided for to one C. Hayden, of Choteau, Cherokee Nation. The fee provided for is 5 per cent of the amount of the recovery, or $64,000.90.

Mr. Peabody makes a claim for legal services under his contract, and makes affidavit that the account is correct and just, and that the services charged for were rendered and charged under and in accordance with his contract; that his services actually date from early in the spring of 1882, he having been brought into the case through Mr. Wilshire, acting then for Mr. Bryan, the terms of his contract having been verbally settled for several months before the contract as reduced to writing was actually signed; that he actively cooperated with counsel for Eastern Cherokees in securing clause in the sundry civil bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and report upon the Old Settler claim, along with other claims in dispute; that on the signing of his contract he continued his services in the line of their inception; the resolution of December 15, 1882, was an incident of his advice and counsel, and its prompt answer by the Interior Department on the 16th of December, 1882, was at his instigation; that the resolution and report of the Secretary of the Interior thereon is embodied in Senate Ex. Doc. No. 17, Forty-seventh Congress, second session; that he assisted C. C. Clements, special agent of the Department, in collecting the data embraced in his report dated December 12, 1882; that it was understood that in the division of the labor among the counsel he should take the lead and assume the responsibility and labor incident to the departmental branch of the case and before committees of Congress, while other counsel should lead and assume the labor and responsibility of the case in the courts, should it ever reach the court for trial.

Except as thereinafter stated, he had been at all times, from the inception of his service in 1882 down to the final passage of the act appropriating the money, ready to consult with his associates and render service in the case, and has so consulted and rendered service covering a period of approximately twelve years of continuous service, with the exceptions above referred to. That on the reopening of the matter in the act of 1882 before the Interior Department, and following the report of Mr. Clements, he appeared before the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and urged the transmittal of the report to the Secretary, which was done December 14, 1882; that he also appeared from day to day before Mr. Clements and assisted him in an examination of the matters under his consideration affecting his clients, which resulted in his further report of January 24, 1883, in which he increased the amount theretofore found due over $50,000. He refers to certain Senate executive documents in support of this statement in his affidavit.

The affidavit is 10 pages in length and the statements contained therein are detailed, date and fact being given. He states that he had frequent conferences with Mr. Wilshire, of which he kept no memorandum, and that he kept no memorandum of his conferences with other counsel since in the case, or of acts to forward the case, because such conferences and acts were so frequent and so a matter of course that he could not keep a minute thereof without noting substantially how he was employed every day. That, as in other cases wherein he has been engaged, he has kept right at work to accomplish the end in view, thinking of success and directing his efforts thereto, and not to keeping a diary, and he is therefore compelled to rely upon printed records of the Government to a degree in pointing out his particular acts of service, with the dates thereof; but that he "desires it to be understood that each of the steps which the case has taken in its forward movement since his connection therewith, except, possibly, the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States and certain of the latter proceedings in the Court of Claims, was with his knowledge and consent; and that when in charge of the particular work in hand such work was not accomplished in any one of its steps without many repeated efforts." That at no stage did the matter move forward of its own motion and inherent justice, it requiring attention and receiving notice from him; that after the finding of fact by the Court of Claims it was plain that the matter should be again referred to that court with power to hear and determine the case to final judgment, and in connection with explaining the same to the proper committees of Congress he appeared from time to time; that as one of the results of such appearance and efforts in which he participated, he refers to Report No. 1680, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, attached to his affidavit; that he was diligent in his efforts before the proper committees of the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, and, whenever necessary, before the Interior Department, in explaining and clearing away whatever difficulties were found to exist from the want of a proper understanding of the merits of the case; that the work particularly assigned to him was accomplished when the case was sent to the Court of Claims the second time, so far as his leadership was concerned, but that he continued to be consulted from time to time until April 21, 1891, when he accepted employment in the Geological Survey, where he continued until October 20, 1893; but during that period the case was in the courts under the management of able counsel, employed especially to conduct it there, and no occasion existed for calling him into consultation, and he rendered no service during that time in the case, though his contract was extended during that period to cover twelve years from its original date by the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior; that when he retired from the service of the Government in October, 1893, the case had been remanded back to the Court of Claims from the Supreme Court of the United States, with directions as to judgment, and it again became a part of his duty to give it attention before the Departments and the committees of Congress. In this service, from December, 1893, he gave the matter his personal attention whenever required so to do by the exigencies of the case; but the array of counsel had been increased from what it had been originally, and less work devolved upon him than in the earlier stages of the case.

Mr. Peabody's affidavit is so long and contains so much that ought not to be therein that it is almost impracticable to determine what service he rendered the Indians as set forth therein. I fail to find that he has specified a single day on which he performed any act of service, the only dates contained therein being dates of documents or public records. As to that part of Mr. Peabody's affidavit which relates to securing the passage through Congress of an act referring the matter to the Court of Claims for adjudication. Mr. John T. Heard has filed a letter inviting attention to Senate Report No. 207, Fiftieth Congress, first session, wherein it is shown that a favorable report was made by the Senate committee on the claim only because of the finding of fact in the case by the Court of Claims in Congressional case No. 14.

This report contains also the views of Hon. J. K. JONES against the bill, wherein he declares that he did not believe that the claimants had any case, and that if they had, he would not be willing to refer the case to the Court of Claims to render judgment after its findings of fact. Mr. Heard was one of the attorneys employed by Mr. Bryan to prosecute the case before the Court of Claims while it was there for finding of fact, and he files this letter because he feels that through his exertions he secured from the Court of Claims a favorable finding, and he does not feel that any other attorney should claim credit for doing the work.

Mr. Voorhees has informally requested that this matter be held up until he has an opportunity to file some papers in the case.

EXHIBIT O.

MEMORANDUM.

Request of John A. Sibbald for the approval of an assignment by W. W. Wilshire.

[Prepared in the Indian Office for use during its consideration.]

This assignment is indorsed on a certified copy of a contract dated July 1, 1882, between J. M. Bryan, attorney in fact for the Old Settler Cherokees, and W. W. Wilshire. This contract was approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs October 9, 1882, and by the Secretary of the Interior October 10, 1882, and expired July 1, 1886. The assignment recites, "For value received I hereby sell and assign to John A. Sibbald and his assigns one-fifth interest in the within contract, which assignment is also indorsed upon the original," and is signed by Mr. Wilshire. Proof is presented by Mr. Sibbald that it is impossible for him to procure the original of said contract, in order to file the same, to have the assignment indorsed thereon approved by the Commissioner and the Secretary.

After the expiration of the contract, one-fifth of which was assigned to Mr. Sibbald, Mr. Wilshire entered into a new contract with the Indians on September 28, 1886, which was to run for five years, having in view the prosecution of the same claim referred to in the old contract. No assignment appears to have been made to Mr. Sibbald of this new contract by Mr. Wilshire, who died August 19, 1888, pending the prosecution of this claim.

The new contract of Mr. Wilshire was approved by this office February 2, 1887, and by the Department February 3, 1887, and is recorded in Miscellaneous Record Book, volume 2, page 47, one of the records of this office.

This assignment of Mr. Sibbald was filed in this office by Mr. J. Walker Cooksey, of Washington, D. C., with his letter of August 1, 1893.

In a letter of September 28, 1893, Mr. Cooksey was advised as follows:

"The contract between Mr. W. W. Wilshire and the Old Settler or Eastern Cherokees, which was entered into July 1, 1882, expired July 1, 1886, without Mr. Wilshire having secured any settlement of the claim in favor of the Indians, and he made a new contract with them September 28, 1886, which was to run for five years, but, as we have seen, he died August 19, 1888. There does not appear of record that any assignment was made of the last contract, or any part thereof, and it is not understood that Mr. Sibbald makes any claim to an interest therein, although it was expressly intended to be in lieu of the other.

"The first contract expired by limitation July 1, 1886, and it could not be recognized by this office as authority for the payment of attorney's fee thereunder, and it is not seen how my approval of any assignment of an interest therein, even if regular, would be of any value or benefit to the assignee."

The ground upon which this view of the matter was taken was that as Mr. Wilshire's estate, if it were paid anything at all on account of his services, would be paid under the contract of September 28, 1886, alone, and not in any manner under the contract of which Mr. Sibbald claims to have an assignment.

In Mr. Sibbald's letter of August 31, 1894, he discusses the opinion of the Attorney-General in the E. John Ellis case (18 Opinions, 517) as one of the reasons supposed by him to have been given why the assignment ought not to be approved. This reason was not raised officially, but the objection was pointed out to him as applying to the contract of which he has an assignment as a part interest; that is, the Wilshire estate have to make their claim under the contract of 1886. Proof of services rendered under the contract which expired could not be recognized as sufficient to pay him under the other, because of the opinion of the Attorney-General that the Department is not authorized to pay for services rendered prior to the date of the contract providing therefor. The contract of 1886 was, it is true, for the continuation of Mr. Wilshire's services, but his rights under the contract of 1882 expired with the contract, and his estate will be required only to show services under the contract which was in existence at the time of his death. This opinion was not cited as an objection to approving Mr. Wilshire's assignment, but to paying anything under the expired contract.

The other objection to the approval of the assignment discussed is that it is for an interest in a contract which has expired, which objection was made in letter of September 28, 1893, above referred to. As to this objection, Mr. Sibbald claims in his letter that the contract of September 28, 1886, was an extension of the contract of 1882, on account of recitations therein contained. The contract provides for the continuance of Mr. Wilshire's employment in behalf of the Old Settler or Western Cherokees, and the consideration of this continuance is that he had efficiently performed his duties in prosecuting their claim under the former contract, and that his familiarity with said contract and laws was such that it was the desire of the claimants that his employment as attorney to the Indians should be continued until their claim should be finally disposed of, and therefore the Indians agreed to continue his employment.

Mr. Sibbald also calls attention to the fact that the contract stipulation that the compensation agreed upon should be in full of all demands of said Wilshire, and any and all services rendered by him for said Indians, and that Mr. Wilshire in consideration of the promises of the claimants and their agreement agreed to continue his services as attorney for said Indians.

Mr. Sibbald claims that these recitals in the contract should be conclusive; that it is a renewal and extension of the first contract upon all the parties for the same consideration; that it recited and proclaimed the services faithfully performed thereunder, and made it a continuation and extension of the first contract, and as such was confirmed by the approval of Commissioner Atkins and Acting Secretary Muldrow, without any modification or explanation whatever. Aside from the legal aspect of the case, Mr. Sibbald claims that by the amendment to the general deficiency act to pay the Old Settler or Western Cherokees the Commissioner's power to approve his claim is beyond all question and removed from all doubt, for, he says, it is a well-settled principle of law that even an equitable assignment passes to the assignee all the rights of the assignor in the entire assignment, and the latter can not, from the time of the assignment, exercise any control over it (6 American and English Cyclopedia of Law, 663), and the question of power to approve his assignment under the appropriation act is discussed by him at length.

It is true, as stated by Mr. Sibbald, that in a letter of April 5, 1887, from this office, it is stated that there is returned to Mr. Wilshire one part of a contract of September 28, 1886, for the extension of the period of five years from September 28, 1886, the contract of 1882 between said Wilshire and the Indians. It appears from this that the office at that time regarded this contract as a renewal and the extension of a contract which, however, had not been in existence for nearly three months, it having expired and all rights having lapsed with its expiration on July 1, 1886.

The office is not bound by this statement in the letter of April 5, 1887, to Mr. Wilshire, for the reason that the question to which it relates was not a point in issue, and it could not be presumed that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs would give as particular attention in that matter as he would when the rights of claimants are raised under it.

The recitals in the contract which referred to the contract of 1882 could not have been intended as an extension of the old contract, which was made for the purpose of continuing Mr. Wilshire's services on behalf of the Old Settlers.

The recitals by Mr. Sibbald from said new contract are merely facts recited by the Indians in the beginning of the contract or preliminaries to the contract, as showing the reason and the consideration which moved them in making the new contract.

As to Mr. Sibbald's claim that his assignment can be acted upon favorably by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under the general powers given in the act making the appropriation, it would seem that this is not such a case as would authorize the Commissioner to exercise his powers in the premises from the fact that the services rendered by Mr. Sibbald were not rendered to the Indians, but to Mr. Wilshire, and that it is not a claim against the Indians, but a claim against his estate. Mr. Wilshire was the responsible party in this contract, the Indians looked to him to perform the work called for in the contract, and the assignment is not out of moneys of the Indian tribe, but out of whatever fee may be allowed Mr. Wilshire's estate.

(Letter to Secretary September 4, 1894.)

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, of the Senator from Utah, to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BROWN. Let the amendment to the amendment be read as modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Interior," in line 8, page 72, insert the words "unless such award has been paid to and accepted in full payment by the claimant."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think there is but one other committee amendment, and that is with regard to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand that the vote just taken was upon the amendment of the committee providing that the claims shall go to the Court of Claims? Do I understand that to be the fact?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir; that was the vote.

Mr. BATE. It all goes to the Court of Claims?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It all goes to the Court of Claims.

Mr. BATE. Before that is done, I have a document I want to have read touching this contract.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think the document has just been read, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BATE. I think not. This document bears particularly on the contract and original parties to the contract between these Indians and Bryan and his associates who did the work.

I will state in a word my object. The original contract between these Old Settler or Cherokee Indians and the attorneys does contain that condition about which we have been contending, that is to say, that they shall set apart 35 per cent to meet contingent expenses, including attorneys' fees. It has in it that clause which has been a subject of material difference, for after speaking of the fund to be set apart, qualifies it by saying "or so much thereof as may be necessary." It was upon that clause in the original resolutions, I take it, that the Secretary of the Interior acted at the time that he appropriated this fund to the extent of $198,000 to the payment of the attorneys' fees. I want that understood, Mr. President. I have here a copy of the original contract in Senate Document No. 77 of the Fifty-fourth Congress. The resolutions are short, and I should like to have those bearing directly on this point likewise inserted, along with the other document, in the RECORD. However, I will read a brief extract from the document, No. 77, in regard to the contract. It is the original contract, signed by the proper parties:

Resolved further, That it is deemed expedient and proper that the said Old Settler Cherokees prosecute the said claim before the Government of the United States to a speedy, just, and final settlement; and for that purpose the following-named persons, J. L. McCoy, J. M. Bryan, and William Wilson, be, and they are hereby, constituted a commission, with full powers to represent said Cherokees before the Government, with full and ample authority to do and cause to be done any act and doing necessary and proper to be done in the premises; and with full authority to employ such assistance in the prosecution of said claim as they may deem necessary, and that a sum equal to 35 per cent of the amount of said claim when recovered, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be set apart and subject to the draft and receipt of said commission, and payable to them or their order by the proper authorities of the United States Government, which per cent shall be applied in the payment of said prosecution and all incidental expenses: Provided, That on a final settlement with said Old Settler Cherokees, the said commission account for their expenditures out of said per cent, and all receipts signed to said United States Government by said commission on account of said per cent shall be taken and deemed to be the receipts of said Old Settler Cherokees for the amount received.

Resolved further, That said commission, either in whole or in part, at their discretion, be authorized to proceed at their earliest convenience to Washington, D. C., to prosecute said claim, and for that purpose they, the said commission, are authorized to make a loan from the Cherokee Nation for funds sufficient to defray their necessary expenses.

Resolved further, That the president of this convention furnish the said commission with a copy of these resolutions.

I certify that the above and foregoing resolutions is a true copy of the original resolutions, this, the 25th day of November, 1875.

WILLIAM WILSON, President Convention.
H. T. LANDRUM, Secretary.

Mr. BERRY. There is a committee amendment in regard to the Five Civilized Tribes. I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to it. It is the next one to be considered, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, under the heading of "Miscellaneous," the Committee on Appropriations propose, in line 8, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which sum so much as may be necessary for expenses of employees for 1897 to be immediately available;" so as to read:

For salaries of the Commissioners appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895, to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, $25,000; for expenses of Commissioners and necessary expenses of employees, $10,000, of which sum so much as may be necessary for expenses of employees for 1897, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 11, after the word "of," to insert "a clerk detailed as;" and in line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-three" and insert "forty-two;" so as to read:

Provided, That $2 per diem for expenses of a clerk detailed as special disbursing agent from date of original detail by Interior Department, while on duty with the Commission, shall be paid therefrom; for clerical help, including secretary of the Commission, $5,600; for contingent expenses of the Commission, $1,400; in all, $42,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the same heading, page 57, line 1, after the word "reimburse," to strike out "himself" and insert "A. S. McKennon."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Under the heading "Miscellaneous," page 57, line 2, after the word "services," insert:

Provided further, That said Commission shall set apart the lands upon which any town is now located in the Indian Territory, together with a reasonable amount of land to provide for the future growth of said town; also all lands occupied by any church, cemetery, school, charitable or penal institution, or public building of any sort outside of the limits of any town; also all mineral lands, including coal-oil and natural-gas lands, now leased, occupied, and improved for mining purposes; that the use of the surface of all other lands in the Indian Territory belonging to the Chickasaw, Choctaw, Cherokee, Muscogee (or Creek), and Seminole tribes shall be allotted equally among their respective citizens, area and value being taken into consideration, such allotments to embrace other Indians and freedmen now living with said tribes, according to the provisions of existing treaties and laws in relation to such other Indians and freedmen.

That the United States courts in said Territory shall have full and exclusive jurisdiction and authority to try and determine all civil causes in law and equity hereafter instituted and all criminal causes for the punishment of any offense committed after the passage of this act by any person in said Territory, and the United States commissioners in said Territory shall have and exercise the powers and jurisdiction already conferred upon them by existing laws of the United States as respects all persons and property in said Territory; and the laws of the United States and the State of Arkansas in force in the Territory shall apply to all persons therein, irrespective of race, said courts exercising jurisdiction thereof as now conferred upon them in the trial of like causes; and any citizen of any one of said tribes otherwise qualified who can speak and understand the English language may serve as a juror in any of said courts.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think in line 25, on page 57, the word "court" should be inserted between "States" and "commissioners;" so that it will read: "United States court commissioners."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "States," in line 25, on page 57, it is proposed to insert the word "court;" so as to read:

And the United States court commissioners in said Territory shall have, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] proposed to raise the point of order on so much of that amendment as relates to the allotment and setting apart of town sites, and I suggest that so much of that part of the amendment be allowed to go over until he appears.

Mr. VEST. I should like to say to the Senator from Florida that if he will wait until the amendment is read, I propose to make a motion which materially changes the issues presented in the amendment as it stands. I will wait until the Secretary has read the amendment, and then submit the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The reading of the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be continued.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the amendment, as follows:

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the United States Senate, two additional judges for said Territory; and the appellate court of said Territory shall designate the places in the several judicial districts therein at which and the times when such judges shall hold court, such courts to be held at the places now provided by law, and at such other places as shall be designated by the appellate court; and said judges shall be members of the appellate court, and shall have all authority, exercise all powers, perform like duties, and receive the same salaries as other judges of said courts, and shall serve for a term of four years from the date of appointment.

That said commission shall continue to exercise all authority heretofore conferred on it by law to negotiate with the Five Tribes, and any agreement made by it with any one of said tribes, when ratified, shall operate to suspend any provisions of this act if in conflict therewith as to said nation.

That no act, ordinance, or resolution of the council of either of the aforesaid Five Tribes hereafter passed shall be of any validity until approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I move to strike out all after the words "Provided further," in line 3 on page 57, down to and including the word "freedmen," in line 18; also to strike out all of lines 3, 4, 5, and 6 on page 59.

The effect of this motion—and it is a very important question, especially to the States bordering the Indian Territory—is to eliminate from the amendment the allotments of land there provided for, and also to eliminate that portion of the amendment which relates to the leases which now exist in the Five Civilized Tribes by the action of the councils of those tribes ratified by the Interior Department. It also strikes out that portion of the amendment which submits all the proceedings or laws and resolutions of the Indian councils to the President for his ratification, leaving only in the amendment those provisions which affect the substitution of the jurisdiction of the United States courts for those of the Indian tribunals as they now exist.

Mr. President, no one can feel a greater interest in this legislation than I do. I have for years been familiar with the condition of affairs in the Indian Territory. The State I represent lies immediately contiguous as to a large portion of its southern frontier upon this Territory, or upon those Five Civilized Tribes. Texas, Arkansas, and Missouri are necessarily more interested in this question than any other of the States of the Union, although it is a question which affects vitally the autonomy of all these Five Civilized Tribes and the general interest of the people of the United States. No one who has not given attention to it can for an instant or to any degree appreciate the situation of affairs now among those Indians. They were removed there from east of the Mississippi River under agreements or treaties made between them and the United States Government. Those treaties, the principal of which was made in 1866, immediately after the termination of the last war, gave to those Indians the occupation of this Territory upon which they now are so long as they maintained their tribal relations and continued to live there. They have never had a fee-simple title; they have had a conditional fee in those lands, and nothing more. But that fee ought to be respected, and their rights, if possible, ought to be respected by the people of the United States. The fact that these are a weak people comparatively, that they have just emerged from a condition of savagery, that they have been greatly wronged in all portions of the Union, makes every generous mind consider their situation with all the forbearance that can be possible under the circumstances. I have always been their friend. I have acted in my capacity as a Senator from the beginning of my service here in the interest, as I believe, of those Indians, in the preservation of their rights, in the advancement of their social and political condition. But we have come to that place where something must be done as a matter of self-preservation to the Indians and to ourselves.

The first preliminary and necessary condition to all agreements made with them has been, and must be, that they would so govern themselves as to preserve life and liberty and property not only for their own citizens, but for those of the States immediately contiguous. It is not possible that this Government ever abdicated the right to protect its own people; it is not possible that they could have made an agreement which would put a social and political cancer in the middle of our territory which threatens the security of the people of the United States immediately contiguous to this area.

Without going into details, I assert as a fact which can not be denied, about which the proof is so overwhelming as to make it absurd to contradict it, that the authorities of the Indian Territory in the Five Civilized Tribes, because of circumstances, probably, for which they are not responsible, are unable to protect life, liberty, and property in their own midst, and that Territory has become a harbor for criminals.

I will confine myself to a personal statement as to the condition of the southern part of my own State. Property has been depreciated 25 per cent in southern Missouri by reason of the condition of affairs in the Indian Territory now. Towns in Kansas and in Missouri have been attacked openly, banks robbed, and railroad trains stopped by armed banditti, whose haunts are in the Indian Territory, among the full-blooded Indians in the mountains. They attack our settlements, perpetrate deeds of unparalleled outrage, and then dash back into the recesses of the Indian Territory, where they are as absolutely secure as if in the middle of the great Sahara Desert.

Along the line of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad, which runs from north to south 240 miles through that Territory, the towns are inhabited by whites. There are to-day in the Indian Territory some 275,000 white people and 80,000 Indians. We have the anomaly of an Indian Territory in which a large majority of the residents and inhabitants are of the white race. It has become, as I say, a harbor for criminals.

More than that, Mr. President, their courts are a travesty upon justice. They are governed by corruption, bribery, and open and notorious fraud. They have laws absolutely antagonistic to our civilization. Their punishments are entirely different from ours. They inflict whipping and even torture, and when death is inflicted, it is done with the rifle, and after the fashion of an Indian when he goes upon the warpath.

Mr. FRYE. That is an improvement on our way of taking life.

Mr. VEST. I shall not stop to discuss whether or not taking life by electricity or the rope is preferable, but I simply mention the fact that they adhere to the rifle because it is indicative of their preference still or prejudice for the old condition and the old weapon to which the Indian has been accustomed in his predatory warfare.

More than this, we intended that Territory as a home for these Indians, where they might learn from us our habits, our laws, and our form of government. They hold their lands to-day by tenure in common, and not by severalty, and what is the result? A few men have there a vast monopoly of all the lands in the Territory. One man has more than forty farms, and under the tenure in common any Indian can fence in any land unoccupied and improve and cultivate it at his will. Some of the half-breeds, with the aggressive and monopolizing tendency of the white race, who have intermarried with the Indian women and become entitled to the rights of members of the tribe, have fenced in more than forty farms, upon which they have put nomadic white men not entitled to be in the Indian Territory. Capital has been furnished by outside speculators, and those farms are cultivated and the proceeds divided, while back in the hills are the peon Indians, the blanket Indians, still in the condition of savagery, not speaking the English language, with no sympathy with the white race, and they are made simply the argument for appealing for the sympathy of Congress and the American people, while that sympathy furnishes money to those half-breeds who cultivate the land, and take the proceeds, and pay nothing to the blanket Indians. The men whom we see here in these galleries representing the Indian tribes represent this system, utterly alien to the purposes of the Government in setting aside that area to be inhabited by them.

Mr. President, we have been forced heretofore by conditions there to establish United States courts. In the treaties made in 1866 with those Indians, after the close of the war, stipulations were made that the United States might establish courts within these Five Civilized Tribes. In three of those treaties these stipulations are contained. It is true—and I want to be entirely frank in the matter—that these treaties also provided that, as to their local affairs, their local Indian tribunals should be permitted to exist. But, as a matter of course, it never was intended that there should be provisions made by law in the way of establishing United States courts which are absolutely inconsistent with the existence of those Indian tribunals. These treaties were made before the smoke had cleared from the battlefields of the last war, and they are necessarily crude and imperfect. Nobody thought then that railroads would run in a few years through that country, and that the scream of the locomotive would be heard in the recesses of the Indian Territory.

What has been the result of our establishing United States courts? We have now three courts with a limited jurisdiction. At the same time we have the anomaly, absolutely impossible, as every lawyer will see, of Indian tribunals exercising jurisdiction over the same subject-matter and in absolute conflict with the tribunals of the United States. In other words, we have 275,000 white people whose lives, liberty, and property are controlled by the jurisdiction of the United States courts established by Congress; we have some 80,000 Indians who appeal to Indian tribunals under different laws with a different legal autonomy; and I assert as a lawyer that it is absolutely impossible that this condition of affairs can continue to exist.

I think the amendment as it is now drawn goes too far. I believe that no drastic enactment is absolutely necessary further than that which I have endeavored upon my motion to retain in the bill. I would do away with this legal inconsistency. I would put the Indians in the Territory under the same laws with the white people. I would endeavor as far as I could kindly, justly, reasonably to meet the new condition of things and to make those two races, if possible, mingle and look to the same source for protection to themselves and their children. Of course we shall be told that even this enactment that I propose partially violates the treaty rights of the Indians.

Mr. President, my answer to that is that there is no intelligent man in the Indian Territory, or outside of it, who does not recognize the fact that these treaty conditions must be done away with to a large extent. It is impossible for the status to be maintained as it now is. All I seek to do is in a spirit of justice and forebearance to meet the absolute necessities now imposed upon us. It is obvious that there was no intention to rob the Indian by this amendment, as proposed by the committee, with which I have nothing to do, because I call attention to the fact that the amendment as it stands under the allotment clause, which I propose to strike out, takes every acre of land in that Territory and divides it among the Indians, and does not give one inch of it to any white man or to any corporation.

The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company, of which I was formerly attorney for a long number of years, has a grant of nearly 2,000,000 acres of land in that Territory conditional upon the fact that the Indian title shall be extinguished. Under this amendment as it stands that title of the railroad, or claim of the railroad, is absolutely eliminated, to which I have not the slightest objection. I shall never vote for any legislation which takes from those Indians one cent which belongs to them, either in real estate or in money. It is their country under the grant given to them, not an absolute, but a conditional fee by the United States. They are entitled to receive all that was granted to them heretofore. No railroad company, no white man, no intruder should ever be permitted to take from them one cent to which they are entitled.

Mr. BERRY. There is nothing in the amendment to give the railroad company anything.

Mr. VEST. Nothing at all. I alluded to that, as I said, to prove that this amendment was not drawn in order to rob the Indians. It gives to them every acre of land in the Territory as it stands now. But my idea is that the Dawes Commission should regulate that matter. That commission has been eminently successful, far more so than I ever expected them to be, I must confess. They are now progressing satisfactorily, and the Indians have at last come to one mental condition for which I am very grateful. They have now ascertained, I believe for the first time, that the United States Government is in earnest. The intelligent men amongst them have now come to what is inevitable—the conclusion that their present condition must be changed. I have told them repeatedly for the last fifteen years, yes, for nearly twenty years, that it was their duty to themselves, to their tribe, and to their children to meet the United States in a fair, friendly, and just spirit, to give up their close corporation, to take their lands, and to change the tenure in common to one in severalty. They have advanced in civilization until now they stand beneath the blazing sun of enlightenment and Christianity. They have schools and legislatures. Let them go still further and assume the full citizenship and the full responsibility that ought to be imposed upon all the denizens of this great country.

This is not a proposition to rob them, to oppress them; it is to protect them; it is to protect the citizens of the contiguous States. Senators who live in States at a distance have no idea of the outrages committed upon the people of Kansas, Missouri, Texas, and Arkansas by reason of the unfortunate situation which now prevails in that Territory.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, all in this bill that relates to the disposal of Indian lands, whether that disposal reaches to the title or whether it reaches to the right of occupancy, ought to go out of this bill and ought to be referred to the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes, with express and serious mandatory instructions to that committee to take this subject under consideration and report a bill to cover the whole subject. It is a subject, Mr. President, that we can not deal with or afford to undertake to deal with by piecemeal. If every hour of the remaining days of this session was devoted to an honest, sincere, and close debate upon the questions of law and fact that are involved in this amendment, the Senate of the United States would then barely be able to reach an intelligent and just conclusion as to what we ought to do in this, the most delicate of all the trusts that we have ever had to execute on the part of this Government.

I will allude very briefly to the history of this matter.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. Do I understand him to make some proposition in regard to the matter? Perhaps there can be some understanding, so that we can stop the debate.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to take all of the subject out of this bill and refer it to the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. All of the subject?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I mean all that relates to the disposal of the lands.

Mr. PETTIGREW. We do not dispose of any lands at all by this amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, we shall see about that.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. If Senators will allow me, I have the floor and I intend to hold it in spite of interruptions until I have the opportunity in a few words to present some views which at least concern me as a Senator.

Mr. PLATT. Then the Senator does not wish me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. I will hear the Senator's question.

Mr. PLATT. I wanted to know whether the Senator understood that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] had moved to strike that part from the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I understood he had.

Mr. PLATT. I did not know whether the Senator understood that.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BATE. With the permission of the Senator from Alabama, I rose at the time he did, but he got the eye of the Chair first, in order to make a point of order on the amendment, and I expect to make it.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the amendment is subject to a point of order, and I think it is also subject to a very much more serious objection, and that is that we are undertaking here to legislate in the dark.

I am informed here, Mr. President, that everybody is in favor of the motion to take the amendment out of the bill. If so, I do not care about delivering any views upon it to the Senate, I prefer to wait until the proper committee get charge of it and go before them.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say to the Senator that what I was aiming at was to close the debate on this question and adopt the remainder—that portion in relation to the court and the enactment of laws in the Territory. I consent to striking out the portion with regard to the apportionment of the lands.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all I want.

Mr. BATE. That is not all I want, Mr. President.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If there is no objection, I will consent to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. We all consent to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, to strike out the portion of the pending amendment indicated? The Chair hears none, and it will be agreed to, in the absence of objection.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask a question. I supposed the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri took out that portion from line 3 to line 18, inclusive, on page 57.

Mr. PLATT. It does; but, if the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] will give me his attention, I think the amendment also included lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, on page 59.

Mr. VEST. It did. I have it marked here, and the Secretary can read it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will accept that portion of the amendment which relates to page 57, but not the other.

Mr. VEST. That strikes out all after the words "Provided further," in line 3, on page 57, down to the end of line 18, on the same page.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That I consent to.

Mr. VEST. That leaves out of the question the other portion of my motion, which strikes out lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, on page 59.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am willing to modify that portion of the amendment so that the laws of the Indians shall be in force unless disapproved by the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The portion of the amendment referred to will now be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Provided further," in line 3, on page 57, it is proposed to strike out all of the amendment of the committee down to and including line 18, on the same page, as follows:

That said commission shall set apart the lands upon which any town is now located in the Indian Territory, together with a reasonable amount of land to provide for the future growth of said town; also all lands occupied by any church, cemetery, school, charitable or penal institution, or public building of any sort outside of the limits of any town; also all mineral lands, including coal-oil and natural-gas lands, now leased, occupied, and improved for mining purposes; that the use of the surface of all other lands in the Indian Territory belonging to the Chickasaw, Choctaw, Cherokee, Muscogee (or Creek), and Seminole tribes shall be allotted equally among their respective citizens, area and value being taken into consideration, such allotments to embrace other Indians and freedmen now living with said tribes, according to the provisions of existing treaties and laws in relation to such other Indians and freedmen.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator to retain the words "United States commissioners," in lines 24 and 25. I see that was amended to read "United States court commissioners." That is not correct. It should be "United States commissioners."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move to strike out the word "court," inserted a few moments ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it remain "United States commissioners," just as it was before.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I had asked to have the word inserted because that is the general title of those officers; but these courts were created by a special act and the title of those officers is "United States commissioners;" therefore the word "court" should not be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the amendment suggested by the Senator from South Dakota will be agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. Let that portion of the amendment relating to the supervisory power of the President be read, so that we may see exactly what is contemplated.

Mr. CHANDLER. You have not provided it yet.

Mr. VEST. The Senator in charge of the bill does not agree to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I understood the Senator did agree to the proposition.

Mr. VEST. No; he agrees to it if it is changed so as to state "unless disapproved by the President." As it is now, it is an affirmative statement that the President shall approve.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the Senator think that the President ought to have power to disapprove?

Mr. VEST. I should prefer myself that the President should have nothing to do with it. I think his labors are sufficient now; that his duties are enough. To make him virtually the governor of the Five Civilized Tribes is a little too much.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator does not agree to any proposition which confers final supervisory power upon the President?

Mr. VEST. I think that matter ought to be left to the Commission which is now in the Indian Territory, to arrange it with the consent of the Indians, and I think it will be properly adjusted. I do not like to take away from them all governmental control of themselves. We have never had any such enactment as this at all.

Besides that, it seems to me physically impossible for the President of the United States to look into the proceedings of every one of those Indians' councils and pass upon every resolution, every appropriation, every police enactment. What does the President of the United States know about those questions?

Mr. HALE. There is now no tribunal that scrutinizes and scans these acts and passes upon them beyond the council itself, is there?

Mr. VEST. That is true; and their governors. They have a government something like ours. They have a council, or a legislative body, and they have a governor.

Mr. HALE. Has the governor, the official who acts as governor, any power to veto an act of the council?

Mr. VEST. I understand he has the veto power. They drew their constitution in similitude of ours.

Mr. HALE. And he must sign every act passed by the council?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; and the council can pass it over his veto.

Mr. HALE. After the fashion of the State governments?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. The trouble about it is that all important legislation in those nations is carried through by bribery and corruption.

Mr. VEST. I think that is true.

Mr. PLATT. It does seem to me that the President or somebody ought in those cases to have power to disapprove.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Missouri to insist upon his further amendment to strike out on page 59?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; but we can determine that hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out of the committee amendment, on page 59, after line 2, the words, "That no act, ordinance, or resolution of the council of either of the aforesaid Five Tribes hereafter passed shall be of any validity until approved by the President of the United States."

Mr. HOAR. I should like to suggest whether it would not be well to have in there also a provision that the bill shall become a law if the President of the United States does not disapprove it within a certain time, like our constitutional provision? That was the arrangement in all our early colonies. It may be very inconvenient for the President in some particular condition of the public business to make such a thorough examination of a legislative enactment as would justify a positive veto. I do not remember which Senator moved the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition is to strike out.

Mr. PLATT. Before the question is taken on the motion to strike out, I will move to perfect the text in the line the Senator from Massachusetts desires, I think.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. PLATT. I move to amend the text by striking out the word "no," in line 3, and inserting "the;" by inserting the letter "s" after the word "act," after the word "ordinance," and after the word "resolution," so as to be "acts," "ordinances," and "resolutions;" after the word "ordinance" to strike out "or" and insert "and;" and after the word "passed" to strike out the words "shall be of any validity until approved" and insert "may be disapproved;" so that it will read:

> That the acts, ordinances, and resolutions of the council of either of the aforesaid Five Tribes hereafter passed may be disapproved by the President of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Ought there not to be a limit to the power of disapproval?

Mr. HAWLEY. A time limit.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. A time limit.

Mr. PLATT. Say six months.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest three months.

Mr. BATE. On that amendment I agree with the Senator from Missouri that it is physically impossible for the President to examine the act. In the next place, I contend that it is amenable to the point of order, of which I have already given notice I intend to make when I shall have the floor. In relation to this particular amendment, it is proposed that the President shall give his approval to the acts of those Five Tribes which may be passed by the council. He has no right to do it under the treaties and under the arrangements which have been existing heretofore, and I shall contend that it is amenable, under the third clause of Rule XVI, to the point of order that it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut moves to amend the clause which the Senator from Missouri moves to strike out.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the amendment so that it will read as follows:

> That the acts, ordinances, and resolutions of the council of either of the aforesaid Five Civilized Tribes hereafter passed may be disapproved by the President of the United States at any time within three months.

Mr. BERRY. Ought there not to be a provision that the acts shall be in force until disapproved, because there are a number of laws—like those to pay mileage and providing for clerks and all that—which, if they had to wait, would be inoperative?

Mr. WHITE. I should like to have the amendment stated again.

Mr. PLATT. I move to insert the words "within three months after the passage thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the amendment so as to read:

> That the acts, ordinances, and resolutions of the council of either of the aforesaid Five Tribes hereafter passed may be disapproved by the President of the United States at any time within three months after the passage thereof.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me a more convenient way would be to shorten the time, and to say that those acts shall not go into effect within thirty days or fifty days after their passage, and may in the meantime be disapproved by the President.

Mr. HALE. "And shall be certified to the President of the United States."

Mr. HOAR. "And shall be certified to the President of the United States." I think any Senator will see that it might be very inconvenient in many cases to have these acts go into force for thirty or forty days. Suppose, as I think the Senator on my left suggested, it were an act for the payment of money and it were in force for a time. The President's disapproval would be of no account. Suppose it were an act involving succession to real estate or personal property or affecting a crime. To have a little period of twenty or thirty or forty days when the old law was changed and have it changed back at the end of that time would be infinitely inconvenient. I suppose the mail from that Territory does not take more than three days to come to Washington.

Most of the States—my own State has a provision that laws shall not take effect ordinarily, though they may make an exception in particular cases, for thirty days after their passage. It seems to me the best way would be to enact that all laws shall take effect thirty days after their passage, unless in the meantime disapproved by the President of the United States, and that they shall be certified to the President upon their passage. I should like to have the clerks take down the amendment:

> All acts, ordinances, and resolutions of the council of either of the aforesaid Five Tribes hereafter passed shall take effect thirty days from their passage, unless in the meantime disapproved by the President of the United States, to whom they shall be certified upon their passage.

Mr. VILAS. Suppose it were a resolution for an adjournment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then I would like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there would be great inconvenience about the pay of members. They ought not to be subjected to that sort of restriction.

Mr. HOAR. There ought to be some exception to the general rule, if the language I propose is clear.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion with reference to the proposed amendment. By the fifth article of the treaty of December 29, 1835, the United States guaranteed to the Cherokee Nation the right by their national council to make and carry into effect all such laws as they may deem necessary for the government and protection of persons and property within their own country belonging to their people or to such persons as have connected themselves with them.

The treaty has been reaffirmed time and time again in pursuance of many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring its validity, as much so as if we were treating with a foreign nation. In the pending bill we are providing for the continuance of the commission to negotiate with these independent nations. Now, how you can upon any bill, and particularly upon an appropriation bill, undertake to declare the invalidity and destroy the obligation of this treaty, it is difficult to see; but how you can do it at the same time that you are authorizing a commission to negotiate to obtain the consent of these people is an inconsistency which certainly ought not to be placed upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. GRAY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, which is, whether there is not now before the Senate a point of order in regard to the whole amendment, as being in the nature of general legislation on an appropriation bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee announced his intention to make a point of order.

Mr. BATE. I am waiting for that purpose.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator whether he has made the point of order?

Mr. BATE. I will make it when I get the floor.

Mr. GRAY. Why should not the Senator do it now?

Mr. BATE. Mr. President——

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I suggest that the text be perfected before the point of order is made. The amendment might be changed so as to affect the question whether the point of order is well taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from Tennessee was withholding his point of order until that had been done.

Mr. BATE. I was, sir.

Mr. BERRY. Let the amendment of the Senator from Missouri be disposed of.

Mr. PLATT. It has been disposed of.

Mr. BERRY. Entirely.

Mr. PLATT. Not this part of it.

Mr. BATE. I raise the point of order——

Mr. BERRY. That part with reference to the President's approval has not been disposed of. I suggest that it be disposed of.

Mr. BATE. I have the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I have dictated to the Secretary the amendment which I propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the condition of the question. The Senator from Missouri has made a motion to strike out certain lines on page 59. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has offered an amendment modifying the text, which will be acted upon before the motion to strike out is put. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] now proposes an amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I desire that my amendment may be read for information, and that I may be allowed to make one observation in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not finished the statement of the parliamentary condition of the question.

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. While the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is pending, the Senator from Massachusetts proposes a further change in language, which will be read at the desk.

Mr. BATE. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to withdraw the proposed amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Then I ask leave to propose mine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has withdrawn his amendment. The Senator from Massachusetts now offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The following is proposed in substitute for lines 3, 4, 5, and 6 on page 59:

That all the acts, ordinances, and resolutions of the council of either of the aforesaid Five Tribes hereafter passed shall be certified immediately upon their passage to the President of the United States, and shall not take effect if disapproved by him or until thirty days after their passage: Provided, That this act shall not apply to resolutions for adjournment.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to point out that all the matters necessary for conducting the current business of the legislature, like the payment of employees or governing their conduct, can be provided for in advance by a general law submitting to each house, or the houses acting without the form of legislature, the power of dealing with those matters just as we deal with our printing or the contingent fund.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would suggest the amendment be put in this form:

No act, ordinance, or resolution of the council of either of the aforesaid Five Tribes hereafter passed shall be valid until the lapse of thirty days after their submission to the President of the United States, except only such as relate to members, employees, and the contingent expenses of the council.

However, I will not move the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the amendment to be withheld. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question was on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment. It was disagreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not hear the vote on the amendment. I can not hear the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was disagreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. No one heard that the question was put. I did not hear it, and I thought I was paying attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again submit the question.

Mr. ALLEN. A point of order has been raised by the Senator from Tennessee, and that is the only question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated some time ago that the Senator from Tennessee suggested that he intended to make a point of order.

Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator from Tennessee to say that he did make it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will allow the Chair to get through its statement.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the point was being withheld pending the effort to amend the text, and the Senator from Tennessee stated that that was the actual status of the matter.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Tennessee has been making the point of order here for half an hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is on the floor of the Senate, and can correct the Chair if it is in error.

Mr. BATE. I understand the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out of the committee amendment lines 3, 4, 5, and 6 on page 59 and insert:

That all acts, ordinances, and resolutions of the council of the aforesaid Five Tribes hereafter passed shall be certified immediately upon their passage to the President of the United States, and shall not take effect if disapproved by him or until thirty days after their passage: Provided, That this act shall not apply to resolutions for adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it; and the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, the condition of the amendment from the committee has been somewhat changed by the various motions which have been made and adopted, especially that of the Senator from Missouri, which has stricken out a good deal of that which was objectionable to those who oppose this character of legislation. There is left, however, in my judgment, the most objectionable feature in the bill, and I invite the attention of the Senate to it because we shall have to vote upon this perhaps very soon, and it, is very important not only to the Indians, but likewise to the Government.

Now, we have stricken out the amendment beginning with the words "Provided further," in line 3, down to line 18, page 57. That involves a good deal of matter that was objectionable, and which I thought was amenable to the point of order I proposed to make. But there are other things in the amendment which are equally objectionable, and upon which I propose to make the point of order. It is obnoxious to section 3 of Rule XVI; and I will read only that part of it which relates to this matter:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

This is a general appropriation bill, and the amendment proposes general legislation. All the general legislation has not been stricken from the bill which is obnoxious to that rule, and therefore I say it should not be ingrafted upon the bill, but should be set aside.

Beginning in line 19, where the motion to strike out ceases, because it extended to and included line 18, it reads thus, and this remains in the amendment:

That the United States courts in said Territory shall have full and exclusive jurisdiction and authority to try and determine all civil causes in law and equity hereafter instituted and all criminal causes for the punishment of any offense committed after the passage of this act by any person in said Territory, and the United States commissioners in said Territory shall have and exercise the powers and jurisdiction already conferred upon them by existing laws of the United States as respects all persons and property in said Territory; and the laws of the United States and the State of Arkansas in force in the Territory shall apply to all persons therein, irrespective of race, said courts exercising jurisdiction thereof as now conferred upon them in the trial of like causes; and any citizen of any one of said tribes otherwise qualified who can speak and understand the English language may serve as a juror in any of said courts.

The next clause is that there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, two additional judges for said Territory, etc. We see now by this that they are to take control absolutely of the entire judiciary of the Civilized Tribes; they are to deprive them of their existing law; they are to deprive them of their existing courts; and they are to violate the treaties which have been solemnly entered into between the Government of the United States and those Indians; and that goes to the vitals of their existence. It not only does that, but it will extend to the destruction of that race of people, so far at least as their present organization is concerned. It will tend to destroy their tribal relations, which in my judgment are essential to the Indians' prosperous existence. My point is, when you do that here by legislation, it is general legislation, and should not be placed upon appropriation bills, and therefore it is obnoxious to the point of order, and should be set aside.

Let us look for a moment and see. We are aware, as has been stated by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] just now, that these tribes of Indians have certain powers of government granted to them. In other words, a fee-simple title to the lands they now hold and local self-government was given by the United States in consideration of lands in Mississippi, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and other States which to-day are worth millions and millions of dollars, and these Indians, under an arrangement made by the United States, went West and settled upon these lands. Now we are told here that in process of time it has become necessary for us to control the Indians who are there and put a different government over them to that which they now have, that will be more acceptable to the United States.

I was somewhat surprised at the statement of my learned friend the Senator from Missouri when he said that the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians have not a fee-simple title to these lands. The best way to answer an argument of that kind is not by discussing it, but by turning to the patent itself and producing the highest affecting this title known to the law. I have a copy of the original patent to this land as granted by the United States to these Indians, which was signed by President Martin Van Buren, and let us see whether it is a fee-simple title that was granted to them. If it was a fee-simple title, then the next question which presents itself is, If they have such title now, what right have we to put, without their consent, a government over that land which we have thus ceded to them? What right have we to take away from the Indians the courts which they have established for their government under the protecting shield of the United States, with guaranty of protection, and which for the last fifty years they have been accustomed to, which have been working well, and have in the main been very successful?

I especially invite the attention of the Senate to this fact in regard to the fee-simple title, as heretofore it has been the subject of much discussion, and the matter has been left in doubt. I looked the matter of title up. I now read from that portion of the treaty which relates to it, and this will show the conditions and how egregious the error of the Senator from Missouri touching the land tenure of these tribes. On page 423 of this treaty, in the appendix, it reads thus:

Therefore—

It is the conclusion of this treaty, and this is a treaty signed by the United States with them when they procured these lands—

Therefore, in execution of the agreements and stipulations contained in the said several treaties, the United States have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant, unto the said Cherokee Nation, the two tracts of land so surveyed and hereinbefore described, containing in the whole fourteen millions three hundred and seventy-four thousand one hundred and thirty-five acres and fourteen-hundredths of an acre, to have and to hold the same, together with all the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereto belonging to the said Cherokee Nation forever.

This is a sample of the treaties which were executed, as I understand, with the other tribes. Now, that is certainly a fee-simple title. No lawyer can dispute that fact. What are the conditions that would do away with that fee-simple right? Let us see. Without troubling the Senate with reading all of this, I turn to where it sums up in a few lines, just above the signature of President Martin Van Buren. What does it say, and what are the conditions to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] alluded? I read:

And which condition is, that the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States if—

"If," mark you, that is a qualification—

if the said Cherokee Nation becomes extinct or abandons the same.

And not having become extinct and not having abandoned the same, of course that fee-simple title which has been granted heretofore by the United States still exists. They own it in fee simple, and owning it in fee simple, what right, I ask, has the Government of the United States, especially when you take into consideration its various treaties, to take possession of this land, change their courts, change their autonomy, and uproot everything connected with their government, and destroy their rights? What right has the Government of the United States to do it? In doing so we are trampling upon the rights of the weak. We are depriving them of that which we have given them under the terms of solemn treaties. We are denying to them that fee-simple title which we have granted solemnly unto them with conditions, and the conditions which would vacate it have not yet transpired. Although there have been repeated attempts to oust them of this fee-simple title and to oust them of their rights under these treaties, yet they have not been able as yet to do it. The United States Government not only acknowledged this right in the Indians but agreed to pay for the land or property in their possession that it may use. It has agreed to pay the Indians in this very treaty, which provides that—

The United States shall always have the right to make and establish such posts and military forts—

This is the reservation—

in any part of the Cherokee country as they may deem proper for the interest and protection of the same, and the free use of as much land, timber, fuel, and materials of all kinds for the construction and support of the same as may be necessary: Provided, That if the private rights of individuals are interfered with a just compensation therefor shall be made.

That is the right, the fee-simple title, that they have in these lands, and the Government, in that solemn treaty, agrees to pay them for any damage to their land or for taking any of their land or other property for public use. Therefore, might I not say, sir, that unless it was taken by the consent of the council of these tribes, which consent is required by every treaty, every acre of land that has been taken for the purpose of running railroad tracks over that Territory 200 feet wide, and there are five or six railroads two or three hundred miles long, the United States Government should pay under the treaty these Indians for that land a just compensation?

Not only that, Mr. President, but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in his speech just concluded alluded to the fact that there had been some grants of land made to the Neosho Valley Railroad Company. Now, what is the history of that transaction? I have it here before me. I say, Mr. President, the United States is standing upon dangerous ground; it is trembling upon the brink of bringing on itself a large indebtedness—of millions. This land is now worth, as I understand it, from $5 to $25 per acre, and being worth that much, if the United States should take away all the rights of these Indians to it, which she seems to be doing by rapid legislative strides, and assume the ownership of this property and the rights to this land in violation of the treaty, will the Government not be bound to these Indians for the land it has granted to this railroad company? And would not this railroad company have a right to it? This, I believe, was the first road constructed through the Indian Territory, and is now known as the M., K. & T., and extends from the Kansas and Missouri line down to the Texas line at a place called Preston, some 250 or 300 miles long, running through the entire Territory. By permission I will give two extracts—but not stop to read them—from that charter by the Congress of the United States, granted in 1866.

[July 25, 1866.]

CHAP. CCXLI.—An act granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad and its extension to Red River.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of aiding the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company, the same being a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Kansas, to construct and operate a railroad from the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad, eastern division, at the line between Kansas and Missouri, at or near the mouth of the Kansas River, on the south side thereof, southwardly, through the eastern tier of counties in Kansas, with a view of its extension, so as to effect a junction at Red River with a railroad now being constructed from Galveston to Red River at or near Preston, in Texas, there is hereby granted to the State of Kansas, for the use and benefit of said railroad company, every alternate section of land or parts thereof, designated by odd numbers, to the extent of ten sections per mile on each side of said road, to be selected within 20 miles from [of] the line of said road, etc.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the same grants of lands through said Indian Territory are hereby made, as provided in the first section of this act, whenever the Indian title shall be extinguished by treaty or otherwise, not to exceed the ratio per mile granted in the first section of this act: Provided, That said lands become a part of the public lands of the United States.

Thus it will be seen how, by such legislation as this, we are approaching this responsibility for millions. The Government transcended its rights in granting these lands conditionally, and I fear it will turn to plague us.

But, Mr. President, we are told that there is a nest of robbers in this Territory. Well, if so, who makes it so? Is it not the white men who go there? According to the statement, they do go there; and very likely while there they perform some very evil deeds. They form organizations that perhaps ought not to exist and are unlawful; but the United States Government is to blame for it. For the treaties say the Government shall keep whites from molesting them. White people have gone there and outnumber the Indians, and they control to a great extent the government of that country. Because these lawless bands of white men—not Indians—are there, is no reason why we should go and take away from the Indians the rights which we have solemnly granted to them.

Is there any part of this country that is exempt from raids upon trains and banks and stores, which have characterized those in this Territory, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] says? You will find them in the North. You will find them in the West and South; and in New England, the other day, parties went into a bank and robbed it. You will find them doing it in Chicago only last week. You will find them in St. Louis and elsewhere. These marauders in the Indian Territory are not alone in that character of crime. While the James brothers live in history, Missouri, the home of the Senator, will be known as a prolific field of such operations. Yet there is no more crime in that State than in any other part of our country. Missouri is a State that observes the law with as much promptness and pertinacity as any State in this Union; yet she is not free from such troubles, no more than is the Indian Territory.

Mr. President, the point I wanted to make especially is that this amendment would be an enforced obligation. These Indians deny the right of the Government to do what it is now seeking to do, to despoil them of their rights which they hold under solemn treaties. If you take the history of the Dawes Commission for some four or five years, since 1893, it will be seen that Congress has been strengthening its power at every session. They, the Commissioners, have been in this Territory and tested the matter in some cases, and I think it proper that the sentiments of these Indians as regards this Commission should be known. The Indians are accepting the situation, not as a matter of choice, but as the best they can do under the embarrassing situation; they are agreeing to the Dawes Commission. They have had their meetings; they have had their councils or legislatures; they have appointed their agents, and they have in some instances met the representatives of the Government in the Dawes Commission in conference; they have sought to treat with them. I believe the Cherokees did enter into an agreement with the Commission, but none of the others have done so for want of time, as the report will show.

One of the ugly features in this—and I know no man here appreciates it more sensibly or highly than the Senator from Missouri—is that while we are holding out to them the hand of negotiation we hold in the other hand a bludgeon with which to brain the Indian. Shame upon us! That is the situation, or at least that is the force and meaning of this amendment when taken in connection with the Dawes Commission. I say this is unmanly; it is cowardly in the Government of the United States thus to extend negotiation to these Indians, and while that negotiation is pending and being considered, that we strike them down with a blow, which we do by this amendment. Why do I say this? Because one of the parts of this bill not stricken out is the following:

That said Commission shall continue to exercise all authority heretofore conferred on it by law to negotiate with the Five Tribes, and any agreement made by it with any one of said tribes, when ratified, shall operate to suspend any provisions of this act if in conflict therewith as to said nation.

This is intended to drive them into an agreement with the Dawes Commission, and if they do not agree to it, they shall get this terrible blow couched in this amendment.

In proof of what I said just now I beg to read a sentence or two from the appeal that is made by these Indians.

We represent—

They say—

70,000 faithful, law-abiding, liberty-loving people, who have, perhaps, too blindly trusted in their treaties as sacred and incapable of being violated.

The act of June 10, 1896, declared for the first time that it was the duty of the United States to establish a government in our country. It was the first declaration of a definite policy.

That met with some success, and now this provision is put in, more drastic, more aggressive, and more ruinous and destructive to the Indians than any measure that was ever offered in Congress. They say even then of the former commission:

Our commissions were authorized, ready, and willing to treat, and of this the United States commission was fully advised (see Senate Ex. Doc. 94, 111, 112, etc.), but these important matters could not possibly be closed up in six days.

They say further that it destroys their judiciary, that it paralyzes their executive department.

I read what these Indians through their representatives have said in their "appeal" to this Congress:

Emasculating our legislative bodies, partitioning and administering our great estates without our consent, without proper safeguards, and regardless of vested rights, as a measure of coercing agreements we are ready to make without coercion.

We earnestly appeal to your high sense of justice and to your magnanimity against this extreme measure.

First. Because it is not necessary. The record proves this (Senate Ex. Doc. 94, 111, 112), but, in addition, we here register our solemn declaration that our people are ready and earnestly intend treating on the lines heretofore indicated by Congress.

That they have not had sufficient opportunity of negotiating, after resolving upon this course last fall.

Second. This measure is unjust, because it puts our people under extreme duress and ruinous conditions, as a manifest and declared preliminary to a proposed negotiation.

We feel that "consent" under such conditions is no consent at all, but the submission of the weak to the impatient violence of the strong, that will give our people a false idea of the great Republic and its citizenship.

It is beneath the dignity of the United States to strike our people to the earth while inviting negotiations. We can not believe that the advocates of this measure would feel justified in pressing it if they should examine the correspondence submitted, and realize the sincerity of our purpose to negotiate.

We earnestly trust that this solemn declaration, made on behalf of the sincerity of our people, will suffice to induce the Congress not to press at this time such an extreme and unnecessary measure.

They assert here in their organization, through their representatives, that they intend to treat with the Dawes Commission, yet this Senate is trying to force this measure upon them.

I now ask the Senate if it is not general legislation, if this is not objectionable to the point of order that I have made, when it reads:

That the United States courts in said Territory shall have full and exclusive jurisdiction.

Who has that jurisdiction now? Let us see if this is not general legislation. Had not the Indians, through their council, through their legislative organization, the control of their own tribe, of their own people? Does not the law, as it now stands, allow only the white man to go before the white man's court? If he has trouble with the Indian, the white man's court has jurisdiction over both. The Indians have exclusive jurisdiction, where Indians alone are concerned, in both criminal and civil suits. This amendment takes the jurisdiction away from those Indians and gives it exclusively to the white man, and hence, you see, it is general legislation, and as such it is amenable, I say, to the point of order.

I read from that part of the amendment not stricken out:

Shall have full and exclusive jurisdiction and authority to try and determine all civil causes in law and equity hereafter instituted, and all criminal causes for the punishment of any offense committed after the passage of this act, etc.

Now, Mr. President, that is taking the jurisdictional authority from them and applying it to another. Is not that general legislation? And is it not obnoxious to paragraph 3 of Rule XVI? I ask that we have a vote on this part of the amendment under my point of order.

In conclusion I assert it deprives the Indian of his rights, and it is general legislation. It is destructive of their courts, their autonomy, and their rights in every respect. It is in violation of the solemn treaty with these Indians entered into with them. Therefore, I say it is general legislation in the wrong direction, and it is general legislation upon that which is vital to them, and more vital to them than anything which has been stricken out. I approve, of course, the striking out of that which has been done on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, or has been conceded by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who has the bill in charge. I concede all that, but this objectionable point, and the most vital, still remains. I think the best thing to do is to get rid of the whole matter. Let us maintain the point of order and let this be stricken out, and on some future day, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama, there can be a general bill framed to regulate all these matters and put the Government of the United States and the Indian also in a proper position.

I ask that my point of order be maintained.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 849) to increase the circulation of national banks was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 3278) to amend section 1 of an act approved December 21, 1893, entitled "An act to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 4803) to increase the efficiency of the postal service was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

TARIFF HEARINGS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress 10,000 copies of the tariff hearings of the Committee on Ways and Means during the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, of which 3,250 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 6,750 copies for the use of the House.

JULIO SANGUILY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 207) demanding the release of Julio Sanguily, an American citizen imprisoned in Cuba.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside, and that we proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BERRY. Temporarily, without prejudice.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Temporarily, without prejudice, if it is desired.

Mr. MORGAN. It was the understanding, by unanimous consent yesterday, that the joint resolution was to come up at 1 o'clock to-day.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then I move that it be laid aside.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can not do that without violating the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WHITE. I am entitled to the floor on the joint resolution, I believe.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am not aware of any such unanimous-consent agreement. I should like to have it read.

Mr. WHITE. I do not object to the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not intend to violate a consent agreement.

Mr. LINDSAY. There was no consent agreement about it, that I understand.

Mr. BERRY. Is the joint resolution to be temporarily laid aside? The Senator from California who has the floor has no objection to that until we can get through with the bill that is now before the Senate. I appeal to the Senator from Alabama not to urge the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from Alabama will consent to allow the joint resolution to go to the Calendar. The telegraphic communications received to-day, undoubtedly reliable, show that Sanguily, by advice of his attorney, has, under duress of a two-years' imprisonment, consented to the judgment and the sentence by withdrawing the appeal; that the Queen Regent has signed the pardon, and that Sanguily is free.

Now, while I regard that as unfortunate in many respects, it seems to me it leaves the joint resolution without any necessity of further consideration. I do not believe, and never did, in wasting powder simply for the purpose of making a noise.

I shall vote, under these circumstances, to proceed with the appropriation bill. I do not believe anyone doubts my friendliness to Cuba. Every pulsation of my heart is with the patriots who are fighting for liberty, and I have an utter detestation of the brutalities of Spain; but I do not believe there is any further necessity of considering the joint resolution. I hope it will be permitted to go to the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. I am acting here——

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Alabama to allow me to say——

Mr. MORGAN. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move to take up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WHITE. I am entitled to the floor; but I have stated that I have no objection to yielding the floor; but I should like to say a word. However, I will yield temporarily to the Senator from Alabama. I do not wish to incommode the Senator in charge of the appropriation bill, and will not do it; but, having the floor, I think I am entitled to the courtesy of a request before I yield it. I may be mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California yields to the Senator from Alabama.

The speech of Mr. WHITE begun yesterday and not concluded is as follows:

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, some time ago I determined to offer certain suggestions with relation to the Cuban question, and especially concerning the Presidential jurisdiction regarding recognition of independence. But as the session was drawing to a close, and as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and other members of that committee specially charged with the consideration of those very important measures warned us that there was no time to be spared, I concluded that the Senate would devote itself to the examination of the appropriation bills, and felt that it would be inopportune for me to interject remarks upon another subject. I therefore withheld my views, intending to offer them later on if they seemed relevant to anything that might hereafter occur. But the proceedings this morning have demonstrated that it is not the intention of the Senate of the United States to engage in the business of considering appropriation bills and that we are to spend valuable hours in sensational utterances. We are to engage in fruitless argumentation upon a resolution which can not pass, and which, if passed, would not become effective or even receive Executive consideration; a resolution which could not aid Mr. Sanguily and would, on the contrary, interfere with the effort now being properly made to accomplish his release.

A resolution was offered several weeks past in this body with reference to Cuban independence. That resolution was not pressed. It came in here with considerable flourish of trumpets, if I may be permitted to use such an expression, and was sidetracked. Some reason, no doubt, existed for this. I have no complaint to make on this account, for I am now and have been opposed to its passage.

When the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON] last night informed the Senate that it was necessary to sit until midnight in order to pass bills to appropriate money to maintain this Government, we were all made aware of the danger of delay, and yet this morning the Senator deliberately displaced the appropriation bills, and practically declared to the people of the United States that the Senate will not, though it can, pass measures of controlling importance, and will needlessly thus create an absolute necessity for the calling of an extra session, while in the opinion of some of us such necessity would not exist if we attended to our plain duty and ceased the making of disturbing remarks.

If we are to discuss Cuba, we shall go on and discuss it. Both sides shall be heard. After a debate which can not be short we will vote upon a resolution, the passage of which can not, as I have said, be followed by any desirable consequences.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from California yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Allow me to suggest here that up to this moment from the beginning of the session all the time on this great subject-matter has been taken up by those who are in favor of what are called the Cuban resolutions. Senators who have not believed it was wise to embark upon that subject or to pass declarations inflammatory in their nature, which would tend to complicate the situation, have contented themselves, as the Senator from California has, as I have, and as have a dozen other Senators, with saying nothing, but depending upon the general conservative spirit of the Senate to go on and do business. We are now within seven or eight days of the end of the session, and Senators should understand that, with this whole subject precipated, those Senators who heretofore have declined to participate in the debate and have allowed it to go on by the advocates of the Cuban resolutions, can not consent that this matter shall be voted upon until it is thoroughly debated, and it can not be said and urged that it is in the interest of delay, because up to this time hardly one Senator has lifted his voice against any of these resolutions. We have been content to go on and do business, I repeat, and desire now to do that, but Senators may as well understand that here, within one week of the end of the session, with all the appropriation bills which have not been passed pending, to take up this question and to begin to debate it and to follow its debate until the question is taken, substantially confiscates every hour of this session, and no appropriation bill can be passed.

I trust the Senators who voted to displace an important appropriation bill in order to take up this joint resolution will realize that we shall not be taunted because we choose to debate this subject, which the Senate has taken on against our votes, with the charge that we are delaying matters. We have a right to be heard, Mr. President, on this question as well as all of the Senators who have fulminated before the country ever since last December, and who will only be content now in dragging this discussion before the Senate. The matter will be discussed, and the other side will be presented.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks of the senior Senator from Maine, I may be permitted to observe that I have taken much interest in the legal aspects of this question; but I have refrained from indulging in any lengthy debate, or doing more than to ask a very occasional question of Senators occupying the floor, because I did not wish to interfere with other measures.

The resolution now forced upon us presents so many grave questions that those of us who differ from the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations should not remain silent, and I for one do not propose to do so. I intend expressing my opinions. It can not be truly stated that I am so acting to consume time, because my course in the past has been demonstrative of my desire in the other direction. If I can prevent the accomplishment of a mistaken plan, I will do so.

Let me ask, preliminarily, What is the object attempted to be brought about by precipitating this discussion at this time, really in violation of the agreement which was tacitly had last night, to devote this day's session to the consideration of appropriation bills? From 11 o'clock this morning until this moment we have been engaged in discussing this resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations only yesterday, accompanied by a report of 96 pages, a large portion of it closely printed. Are we entitled to examine that report? Can this be done in a minute?

Assuming that there is reason for the passage of this resolution, assuming that there is a result in sight, and a desire to benefit this unfortunate man—though the course adopted is most hurtful to him—assuming all this, let me inquire by what authority and in what manner do Senators who are so fervid expect to accomplish anything by its passage in this body? Let it be granted that the Senate of the United States shall adopt it; let it be granted that those of us who oppose the views of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall remain silent and allow everything to be said by the other side and permit the resolution to go through intact. Then the House of Representatives is reached; grant that it shall be accorded a favorable reception there—and this is purely a matter of assumption—then, as the resolution is joint, it must be presented to the President of the United States. Is it to be supposed that he will approve it? Manifestly not. I speak from the record, a record of which every Senator should be thoroughly cognizant. The executive department of this Government has had this affair under advisement. The President has been acting within the lines of his authority and has considered this very issue. He has done his duty as he understands it, and if he is to be consistent he will pocket this joint resolution. Do the advocates of this resolution think that anything practical is to be gained by pressing it here and now? It will not benefit Sanguily. It will avail no one.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. The premier of the next Administration reported this joint resolution to the Senate yesterday.

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. And while he would not ask it to be acted upon then, he expressed a hope that the Senate would take it up to-day and pass it at once. It is whispered to me from the rear that he voted against its consideration to-day; but I was not going to make that statement. I simply suggest that even if the Senate alone passes the resolution, it will at least have some moral effect upon the next Administration, I should hope.

Mr. WHITE. I differ from the Senator from New York. I hope the Senator from New York will not make it incumbent on the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to carry into his policy as Secretary of State the views which he has announced in this Chamber.

Mr. HILL. Why should he not be consistent?

Mr. WHITE. It is within his power and sole jurisdiction, Mr. President, it appears to me, to be or not to be consistent [laughter], and I submit that the Senator from New York should not seek to tread within that sacred circle. [Laughter.]

It is a fact that the Committee on Foreign Relations, having had Cuban affairs under their consideration, and having had an opportunity to press them when a final vote might have been reached, have nevertheless waited until the appropriation bills have come here, and then have sought a final decision. I for one, occupyiny a seat upon the minority side of this Chamber, do not wish it truthfully charged that I have been a participant in the defeat of appropriation bills, but I do not propose to be foreclosed of mp right to discuss this subject which has been incontinently and improperly interjected into our business.

I think I have shown, Mr. President, that nothing of good can follow the adoption of this joint resolution even by the Senate and the House. It has no place here. Sanguily does not need it. Common sense dictates that his case will not be furthered by its adoption. Why not withdraw it?

Mr. President, there are several resolutions on the Calendar touching the Cuban question. That part of our history which covers Cuban disturbances is rather a peculiar one. I will present the general resolution 163, which I ask may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That it is hereby declared that a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba, and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Mr. WHITE. Then there was introduced the following resolution by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the question of the recognition by this Government of any people as a free and independent nation is one exclusively for the determination of Congress in its capacity as the lawmaking power.

Resolved further, That this prerogative of sovereign power does not appertain to the executive department of the Government, except in so far as the President is, under the Constitution, by the exercise of the veto, made a part of the lawmaking power of the Government.

Then we have the joint resolution of this morning, which has already been read, but which I shall incorporate in my remarks, accompanied, as I said before, by Report No. 1534, comprising 96 pages of largely, closely printed matter.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Government of the United States demands the immediate and unconditional release of Julio Sanguily, a citizen of the United States, from imprisonment and arrest under the charges that are pending and are being prosecuted against him in the military and civil courts of Cuba, upon alleged grounds of rebellion and kidnaping, contrary to the treaty rights of each of said Governments and in violation of the laws of nations.

And the President of the United States is requested to communicate this resolution to the Government of Spain, and to demand of that Government such compensation as he shall deem just for the imprisonment and sufferings of Julio Sanguily.

We have not adopted the resolution regarding independence. At the last session we expressed an opinion favoring recognition of belligerency. This was a mere expression of opinion. It was in no way binding on the Executive. Our attitude is peculiar. We are not willing to recognize the independence of Cuba. In my judgment we are without power to do so. Then we are expected to demand the release of an alleged American citizen charged with the commission of crime abroad. We are required to find his citizenship, to declare him innocent, and to, by implication, censure the Department of State. All this is to be done without examination—proceeding upon faith entirely—in the last days of this Congress.

Mr. President, the termination of this Administration will soon be witnessed. Everyone in this Chamber knows that upon the most important and radical issue before the American people I dissent from the position of Mr. Cleveland as clearly and as fully as I expect to dissent from the financial policy of the Administration of Mr. McKinley, but I do not permit my views upon one or a dozen subjects to interfere at all with my defense of the conduct of the Executive in the matters now under review. I deem it my duty to see that something is presented in justification of the President and the Secretary of State with reference to unfounded accusations of usurpation which have been repeated with wearying frequency here and elsewhere. Were the appropriation bills allowed a right of way, I would postpone my observations; but I must deal with conditions as I find them.

The joint resolution reported by the Senator from Alabama who sits in front of me [Mr. MORGAN], with the indorsement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who is to be the Secretary of State, comes to us just as this Administration is going out. The Senator from Ohio, as the head of the diplomatic department of the incoming Government, will soon attend to this matter himself. Instead of coming here as chairman of his committee and now seeking to put the burden upon us, let him wait a few days and take the responsibility himself. He will have to do so ultimately. Why does he not abstain rather than to join in an effort to defeat the appropriation bills and precipitate a discussion which can have only that result, and which will not, I assure him, end in the passage of the joint resolution here pending?

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio gladly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from California seems to desire to drag me into this debate when I certainly do not care to enter upon it.

As to the joint resolution which is pending, I think it ought to command the unanimous approval of the Senate. I believe in the declaration that injustice, gross injustice, almost barbarous injustice, has been done to a naturalized citizen of the United States, and I say, therefore, that his rights, the rights of even a single person, ought to be respected, guarded, and protected by the Senate of the United States.

I have not, however, been in favor, and am not now in favor, of passing this joint resolution at this moment when it stands in the way of appropriation bills. I have so voted and shall so vote again, and I trust that, after the debate has gone on for a while, Senators here will see the necessity of taking up the appropriation bills and passing them.

I do not think there is any matter of criticism in the fact that this joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations by the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] rather than by myself. That was done because he has taken a more active interest in the subject than I. He has prepared a long, full, and detailed report setting out every material fact which bears upon the case. Therefore at my request that Senator properly reported the joint resolution, and I shall vote for it.

I hope that Senators will not be carried off merely because they have been defeated upon a question of the order of business. They themselves stand in the way of a vote on this resolution. I believe the friends of the joint resolution are willing to vote upon it without delay, and thus the opinion of the Senate may be had and the appropriation bills be taken up; but to say that, because we desire this joint resolution to be passed, we are opposed to the passage of appropriation bills is a gross injustice to us. I intend to support and stand by the Committee on Appropriations this day and until the end of the session, in order that they may complete all the appropriation bills which are necessary in order to carry on the operations of the Government; but that shall not prevent me from doing what I think is right in behalf of any of the people of the United States to protect our citizens against unlawful insolence, violence, and wrong. I trust in God the time will never come when I shall see an American citizen wronged of his rights and persecuted and prosecuted unjustly by any power, great or small. That is the way I feel now.

I am in favor of protecting this particular American citizen, although he is a naturalized citizen, in all the rights of man. I would not see him destroyed or driven to the fate of another naturalized citizen who was probably compelled to kill himself, or who was killed in custody. I am opposed to wrong and violence and tyranny wherever it is exercised, and when it is inflicted upon a citizen of the United States I will stand by him if I am alone.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, we are all opposed to wrong. Of course we are all in favor, I hope, of protecting American citizens. I am as resolute in this as the Senator from Ohio. Some of us differ as to exactly how we should go about it; some of us prefer that an American citizen should be actually protected, while some prefer to talk of protection without bringing it about. The American citizen who behaves himself will be protected. Whether he acts lawfully or otherwise, he will be guarded in his rights. But I must have a case reasonably proven before I can act.

The Senator from Ohio, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, allowed this joint resolution to be brought in, when he knew that thereby he would precipitate a debate and that nothing practical could come of it. Did he think that those of us who have refused heretofore to engage in discussions because we did not wish to interfere with legislation would be driven from the assertion of our conscientious opinions by the pretext that we were consuming time, and this because we do not wish an obnoxious resolution to be voted upon? The Sanguily matter has been before his committee for months, and he selected the most inopportune time for this display. The Senator from Alabama is an able man and thoroughly conversant with these questions, but the Senator from Ohio did not escape any responsibility for himself when the Senator from Alabama reported the resolution. The Senator from Ohio, knowing that this resolution could not be adopted, knowing that within ten days he will be in charge of the State Department, still risked the defeat of the appropriation bills. Having done that, he turns around and says he is in favor of taking up the appropriation bills and regrets the disturbance which he himself has inflicted upon us. This may appear to the Senator from Ohio to be consistent. It does not appear to me to be very consistent.

More than that, the Senator says that he ascertained that Julio Sanguily was being badly treated. When did he learn that? Within the last two or three days? As chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, he ought to have known as much about this matter as those of us who are not upon that great committee. There was brought into the Senate many, many days ago, Senate Document 104, setting forth all the evidence contained in the report of the committee presented to us this morning. So this subject was before the Senator from Ohio, and before those who sympathize and agree with him, weeks ago, and action was withheld until this late hour, when, as I have stated, the able and conservative Senator who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had announced the impossibility of legislation unless we devote unremittingly each full day remaining to our proper work. Senate Document 104, containing all this evidence, was filed here on February 1 of this year, and its contents, it is safe to say, were known to the Senator from Ohio much earlier. If he has other information, he has not disclosed it.

The merits of Julio Sanguily's complaint can be dealt with by the Senator from Ohio in ten days from this date in accordance with his views of the proprieties. That it can not be dealt with earlier, except in accordance with the views of the present Administration, is a fact which, whether he likes it or not, he must concede. Why, then, press the resolution? The first and most important question, perhaps, calling for examination, is that involving the power of Congress to pass a general resolution of recognition, either of belligerengy or independence. It is not proposed to rely upon legislation enacted upon any supposition or presumption, but it is sought to directly recognize the independence of an alleged Cuban republic, not only without Executive concurrence, but in the face of the fact that the Executive has steadfastly declined to make such recognition. It is the determination of the advocates of Congressional power to force recognition in spite of the Executive. Can this be done? At the outset it is proper to consider whether Congress has any such power, and if it is ascertained that the authority exists, whether a proper case has arisen for its exercise.

When it was stated that the Secretary of State claimed that the Executive possessed the exclusive authority to recognize independence, he was denounced in many quarters, not only in various newspapers, but also upon this floor; and it was even stated here that the doctrine which he advanced was absolutely novel, and that no similar pretension had ever been made. This groundless assertion has been so far modified that a distinguished Senator who ably advocated the so-called Cuban side of the controversy declared that the claim was first made twenty-three years ago. It will be easy to show that not only is there nothing new in the recent announcement of the Secretary of State, but that the view which he has taken seems to be supportable on principle, and is certainly in accord with the best precedents, diplomatic and judicial. There is nowhere in the Constitution a direct delegation, in terms, of power to recognize belligerency. Nothing of the kind is contained in the legislative grant, nor does specific phraseology conferring the authority manifest itself in that part of the organic law which is devoted to the executive department. It was lately said by a most able and learned Senator, with regard to the constitutional provisions referring to the Congress, that—

> There are more provisions devoted to that subject than to any other. It precedes the judicial department; it precedes the executive department; it is first in time, first in right, power, and authority.

And the same learned Senator further remarked:

> If, then, the President perversely and lawlessly refuses or declines to appoint an ambassador when Congress desires one in the form of law, we could direct by law that he should appoint one to a particular country; and in case of his further refusal, we could name and designate a person as our political agent to perform such duties as are usually performed by the Presidential appointee, because such a power is necessary and proper to the execution of the paramount power of Congress to regulate our intercourse with foreign nations. And we may well note here how close this construction is in harmony with the Constitution, a harmony designed in all its parts, because such an appointee by Congress, the person temporarily designated by Congress, vested with ambassadorial, consular, or ministerial powers would receive a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress, the Senate and the House of Representatives, a larger majority than if he had been appointed and commissioned by the President and the Senate to that office, for such law could only be passed over the veto of the President by a two-thirds vote of both the Senate and the House.

Notwithstanding my high regard for the abilities and character of the distinguished Senator from whom I have quoted, I find myself unable to subscribe to this doctrine. While it is true that a law which passes over the Presidential veto receives a larger majority than would an appointee of the President confirmed by the Senate, yet it appears to me that this is not the point at all. The treaty-making power is vested in the Executive, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, and while a treaty may be repealed by a law, it can not be made in any other way than that designated in the organic instrument. The President must propose the treaty. He may withdraw a treaty before ratification. He may decline to submit an amended treaty to the other contracting power. If the Senate unanimously votes to make a treaty, such vote is of no effect unless the Executive submits the convention.

President Harrison, without consulting the Senate or either branch of Congress, recognized the Dole Government of the Hawaiian Islands, and the Secretary of State, on the 15th of February, 1893, placed before Congress a treaty of annexation entered into by this Government with the representatives of the new establishment of Hawaii. This treaty was being considered by the Senate when it was withdrawn by President Cleveland, and although it has been generally supposed that a majority of the Senate favored the scheme outlined in that document, no opportunity was given to vote upon it, and no one denied the authority of the President to withdraw the proposition; and whether the Senate relished Mr. Cleveland's action or did not relish it was entirely immaterial. He had the constitutional power to act as he did, and although Senators might have considered that they were better advised in the premises than the President, nevertheless this faith in themselves was not potential enough to overcome constitutional obstacles.

I can not bring myself to believe that the mere fact that Congressional powers are enumerated earlier in the Constitution than those of the Executive adds anything to the authority expressly given. The words used to confer power upon the Executive are just as potential for the purposes named as those which demark legislative limits. While it is true, perhaps, that the more weighty obligations are assigned to the Congress, yet this does not affect the completeness and exclusiveness of the Presidential grant as far as made. If the Supreme Court, contumaciously or corruptly, fails to decide cases submitted to it, Congress can not, for that reason, do the work of the court. The argument that there is danger that the President may refuse to do his duty is not new. It was largely acted upon in the formulation of the Articles of Confederation, but the views of our early statesmen were considerably modified when the constitutional convention met. That power given might be abused all knew. It was not expected that a system could be devised which would render usurpation or other misconduct impossible. Various duties were assigned to different officers in the hope that such distribution would result beneficially, and that evil would less frequently prevail than under other dispensations. The claim made that the President represents the one-man power and Congress the people is mythical.

The President and Congress and the judiciary each and all represent the people, and the Government thus formed constitutes that system, composed of three independent departments which the people have ordained. The department which is the repository of executive power is the creation of the people and represents their behests, and he who seeks to deprive the executive of those rights attacks the people and endeavors to avoid the popular will constitutionally expressed. Congress can not usurp executive functions. If the President may not exercise power conferred upon Congress, so also is it true that Congress can not trench upon executive territory. The functions permitted to the executive and those committed to the judiciary and Congress in the aggregate constitute, as I have said, the governmental scheme outlined in the organic law. It appears to me peculiar to hold that the defined and limited jurisdiction of the Congress possesses an absorbing and accumulating nature adequate to draw to itself the nonasserted powers of the other departments, that Congress is the beneficiary of executive nonaction.

If it be true that we are governed under a system of delegated powers, under what rule of construction can we hold that, although the Constitution gives to the President and does not give to Congress the power to appoint ambassadors, nevertheless, if the President refuses to do so, Congress may undertake his constitutional duty? It seems to be thought that the exigencies of the situation will justify this. No exigency can warrant the doing of any act by either department not permitted by the Constitution. The powers not conferred by the Constitution are reserved. This reservation is not made in favor of Congress. It was not designed to give plenary authority to Congress. The people, it is true, jealously guarded their rights, but the whole plan was formed to protect their interests. The experiences of the confederation had not been lost. The ablest men of the time believed that three departments, distinct, independent, each separated from the other by impassable lines, were essential to the perpetuity of free institutions. Neither of these can lawfully grasp jurisdiction because of nonexertion by the department to which it has been committed.

The absolute separation of the executive from the other departments was early the subject of solicitude. In the convention Mr. King expressed his apprehension that an extreme caution in favor of liberty might enervate the Government we were forming. He wished the House to recur to the primitive axiom that the three great departments of government should be separate and independent; that the executive and judiciary should be so as well as the legislative; that the executive should be so equally with the judiciary. Those who desire to study this portion of the debates will find it in the Second Journal Constitutional Convention (Madison), page 394.

During the debate upon the executive power, Mr. Madison said (I Journal, page 387):

> If it be a fundamental principle of free government that the legislative, executive, and judiciary powers should be separately exercised, it is clear also that they be independently exercised. There is the same and perhaps greater reason why the executive should be independent of the legislative than why the judiciary should.

This, Mr. President, is the language of Madison.

It was well said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Marbury vs. Madison (1 Cranch, 176):

> The powers of the legislature are defined and limited, and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten, the Constitution is written. To what purposes are powers limited and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing if these limits may at any time be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed are of equal obligation.

And in the same case it was also said:

> Questions in their nature political, or which are by the constitutional laws submitted to the Executive, can never be made in this court.

In Kendall vs. United States (12 Peters, 610) the court said:

> The executive power is vested in a President, and as far as his powers are derived from the Constitution he is beyond the reach of any other department, except in the mode prescribed by the Constitution through the impeaching power.

The very basis of our governmental plan is the distribution of responsibility among the several departments. Unquestionably the Executive may fail to do his duty, and great public interests may be sacrificed; but so, also, may it be said that Congress may fail to act discreetly, and thereby sacrifice grave public interests. Charges of that kind have been often made, and there has been much evidence in support of the accusations.

If Congress has the right to appoint an ambassador in the case already mentioned, who is to determine whether the refusal of the President to make an appointment has been perverse or lawless? The answer will probably be that Congress must determine the fact. Therefore, it necessarily results that whenever the legislative department may decide to harass the President, it can find this jurisdictional fact and can thereupon assert his prerogatives, and practically exercise the functions of government committed to him.

But I am unable to find a word in the Constitution directly or by implication assigning Presidential functions to Congress when the Executive declines to act affirmatively. As well might it be urged that a similar failure of Congress, with reference to some conceded duty, such as appropriating money for necessary public purposes, would vest authority in the President to meet the exigency. With equal reason it might be contended that because the Senate to-day declines to act upon appropriation bills, and devotes itself to issues upon other topics, that therefore the President alone has the power to appropriate money.

Presidential obligation or Congressional duty are not enjoined conditionally. The grant is in each instance absolute. Neither department has a contingent right to move. The location of jurisdiction is fixed by the instrument and not by the whim or caprice of the official. It can always be found. It needs no expert to discover it, nor is it located first here and then there. The plea that somebody could act the fool or the knave was no doubt a factor in the convention's deliberations. If it was believed that a man selected to the highest national office could be trusted to obey the Constitution, especially with the sword of impeachment hanging over him, such assumption was probably based upon the idea that the people would most likely choose an honest and capable man, and that the presence of such honesty and capability was necessarily involved in the faith of the fathers that a republican government was possible.

The authors of the Federalist frequently had occasion to refer to the division of power, and they strenuously contended that proper lines of demarcation had been provided. There is not a hint anywhere indicating that it was supposed that Congress had the right to exercise in any event or at all the duties assigned to the Executive.

The President has power to grant reprieves and pardons, except in cases of impeachment, and this authority is exclusive, as stated in Klein's case. (13 Wall. U. S., 138.) He is also given jurisdiction, by and with the advice of the Senate, to make treaties, and he shall nominate and by and with the advice of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors, etc. The exclusiveness of the grant is as evident in the case of the executive as in the Congressional and judicial instances. Mr. Justice Story says:

> In the government of this commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive or judicial powers, or either of them, etc. (I Story, Cons., section 520.)

James Wilson, who was an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and professor of law in the College of Philadelphia, in the course of a lecture delivered by him on "Government" (to be found in volume 1, Wilson's Works, Andrews's edition, page 365) says:

> Though the foregoing great powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, are all necessary to a good government, yet it is of the last importance that each of them be preserved distinct and unmingled in the exercise of its separate powers with either or with both of the others. Here every degree of confusion of the plan will produce a corresponding degree of interference, opposition, combination, or perplexity in its execution. * * * Liberty and security in government depend not on the limits which the rulers may please to assign to the exercise of their own powers, but on the boundaries within which their powers are circumscribed by the constitution.

He further says (page 367)—and his language may be quoted with appropriateness here:

> Each of the great powers of government should be independent as well as distinct. * * * The independency of each power consists in this, that its proceedings, and the motives, views, and principles which produce those proceedings, should be free from the remotest influence, direct or indirect, of either of the other two powers.

In speaking of the power of the President to grant pardons, Mr. Rawle (Rawle on the Constitution, page 164) concludes that in the case of a vacancy in the office of President there is no power to grant pardons, and remarks (page 166) that in the exercise of the benign prerogative of pardoning it has been justly said that the President stands alone.

The authors of the Federalist understood that they were giving to the President considerable authority.

Mr. Madison's remarks, to be found in the thirty-eighth number of the Federalist, pages 291, 292, Hamilton's edition, clearly prove that he was not only cognizant of the fullness of executive power, but that he justified it.

In discussing the objections made to the Constitution with reference to the blending of powers, Mr. Madison declares (47 Federalist, 373):

> No political truth is certainly of greater intrinsic value or is stamped with the authority of more enlightened patrons of liberty than that on which the objection is founded. The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny. Were the Federal Constitution, therefore, really chargeable with this accumulation of power, or with a mixture of powers, having a dangerous tendency to such an accumulation, no further arguments would be necessary to inspire a universal reprobation of the system. I persuade myself, however, that it will be made apparent to every one that the charge can not be supported, and that the maxim on which it relies has been totally misconceived and misapplied.

I quote again from Mr. Madison:

> It is agreed on all sides that the powers properly belonging to one of the departments ought not to be directly and completely administered by either of the other departments. It is equally evident that neither of them ought to possess, directly or indirectly, an overruling influence over the others in the administration of their respective powers. It will not be denied that power is of an encroaching nature, and that it ought to be effectually restrained from passing the limits assigned to it.

After discriminating, therefore, in theory, the several classes of power, as they may in their nature be legislative, executive, or judicial, the next, and most difficult task, is to provide some practical security for each against the invasion of the others. What this security ought to be is the great problem to be solved.

Will it be sufficient to mark, with precision, the boundaries of these departments, in the Constitution of the Government, and to trust to these parchment barriers against the encroaching spirit of power?

This is the security which appears to have been principally relied on by the compilers of most of the American constitutions. But experience assures us that the efficacy of the provision has been greatly overrated, and that some more adequate defense is indispensably necessary for the more feeble against the more powerful members of the Government. The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex.

Said Mr. Justice Harlan, in Clough vs. Curtis (134 U. S., 371):

One branch of this Government, this court said in the Sinking Fund Cases (99 U. S., 700), can not encroach on the domain of another without danger. The safety of our Constitution depends in no slight degree on the strict observance of this salutary rule.

It is undoubtedly true, as said by Chief Justice Fuller in Ex parte Tyler (149 U. S., 164), that the maintenance of a system of checks and balances characteristic of republican institutions requires the coordinate departments of Government, whether Federal or State, to refrain from infringement on the independence of each other.

It might be added that the lodgment of concurrent authority in the executive and legislative departments could never have been intended. The confusion sure to ensue from such a plan is manifest. Nor is there any reason to suppose that any Presidential prerogative is made dependent upon the nonaction of Congress. If there is a word in the Constitution justifying the assertion that the President has the right to recognize independence until Congress sees fit to act, and that then his power ceases, it has not been pointed out. The Presidential power in this respect has been exercised during recess and when Congress was in session, and has never been successfully combated.

By affixing his signature to an act or a treaty containing such phrase, the President does not effect any change in the Constitution. He can not take constitutional power in virtue of any clause of an act of Congress; nor can he so surrender it. The constitutional power of each of the three great departments of the Government, respectively, belongs to the offices, not the officers, and can not, by any act or words of theirs, be withdrawn from the permanent and pervading authority of the Constitution. (7 Op. Atty. Gen. (Cushing), 276.)

Said Attorney-General Black (9 Op. Atty. Gen., 468–469):

As Commander-in-Chief of the Army it is your (the President's) own judgment what officer shall perform any particular duty, and as the supreme executive magistrate you have the power of appointment. Congress could not, if it would, take away from the President, or in any wise diminish, the authority conferred upon him by the Constitution. * * * If Congress had really intended to make him independent of you, that purpose could not be accomplished in this indirect manner any more than if it was attempted directly. Congress is vested with legislative power; the authority of the President is executive. Neither has a right to interfere with the functions of the other.

Whether the powers conferred upon Congress are more important than those devolving upon the President it is immaterial to inquire. It may be assumed for the sake of argument that the greater responsibility rests upon the former. It is, nevertheless, true that the failure on the part of the President to exercise those functions which pertain to his office and which are not permitted to Congress, can not result in an investiture of authority in the legislative department; nor is it correct to say that the framers of the Constitution intended to subordinate the Executive to the Congressional will in cases other than those where such intention is plainly announced.

In considering the President, Hamilton said (The Federalist, No. 73, page 546):

The propensity of the legislative department to intrude upon the rights and to absorb the powers of the other departments has been already more than once suggested; the insufficiency of a mere parchment delineation of the boundaries of each has also been remarked; and the necessity of furnishing each with constitutional arms for its own defense has been inferred and proved.

In further discussing the reasons for the conferring of authority upon the President, Mr. Hamilton continues (page 547):

The propriety of the thing does not turn upon the supposition of special wisdom or virtue in the Executive, but upon the supposition that the legislative will not be infallible; that the love of power may sometimes betray it into a disposition to encroach upon the rights of the other members of the Government; that the spirit of faction may sometimes prevent its deliberations; that impressions of the moment may sometimes hurry it into measures which its own mature reflection would condemn.

Examples of this kind are, as we all know, of frequent occurrence. These expressions were used with reference to the veto power, but demonstrate that the legislative department was not regarded as constituting an errorless tribunal.

The same view of the subject has been taken by constitutional writers since that time. Justice Miller, in his Lectures on Constitutional Law, page 94, mentions the fear which was entertained with reference to the powers of the executive, and in commenting thereon he says:

This belief, though natural enough at that time, was a very great mistake. The nearer we approach to individual responsibility in the executive, the nearer will it come to perfection. It is my deliberate opinion that of all the three branches which have been discussed, the executive has been in time, under the construction given to the Federal Constitution and its practical administration, most shorn of the powers granted to it thereby. * * * But the branch of the Government which has grown the most, and which a sagacious man might, perhaps, have foreseen would so expand, is the legislative.

Justice Miller also says (Lectures, page 157):

The experience of a century of the operations of the Government has shown that while the growth of the country in territory, in population, in wealth, and in power has added largely to the patronage of the Executive in the way of appointments to office and to the importance of those offices, and while the frequent accession of successful and popular military chiefs to the Presidency, some of whom were men of arbitrary disposition, and well inclined to the exercise of all the power which the Constitution gave them, and who have shown in every instance a disposition for a continuance in power by seeking or accepting a reelection, there has never been the slightest danger to the liberties of the country, or of an overthrow of the existing institutions, or of any material infraction of the general principles of constitutional government from this quarter. In fact, of all the three branches of the constitutional government of the United States, the executive has been the most crippled, confined, and limited in its practical use, during the period mentioned, of the power really conferred on it.

See also Story on the Constitution, section 1570.

These comments, it is submitted, are sufficient to justify the statement that the powers delegated to the Executive by the organic law are not, in the event of his neglect to exercise the same vested in any other department of the Government. It is true that impeachment can scarcely be called a remedy, but it is likewise true that the power to impeach is a deterrent, and the responsibility of the President to the people and the authority vested in Congress to impeach him constitute ample security against maladministration. To assume that it is necessary or that it would be proper to otherwise limit the authority of the Chief Magistrate is to insinuate that the system under which we are operating is a failure, and that the people can not find within their midst a man to whom the discharge of the obligations of the Chief Magistracy can be safely confided. I will hereafter discuss the relative fitness of the Executive and Congress to deal with diplomatic questions.

During the convention Mr. Morris remarked, in response to a suggestion by Mr. Madison, who favored the trial of the President on impeachment proceedings by the Supreme Court, that he thought no other tribunal than the Senate could be trusted. The Supreme Court were too few in number, and might be warped or corrupted. He was against a dependence of the Executive on the Legislature, considering the legislative tyranny the great danger to be apprehended; but there could be no danger that the Senate would say untruly, on their oaths, that the President was guilty of crimes or facts, especially as in four years he can be turned out.

Those who are curious with reference to this interesting portion of the discussion can find it in 5 Elliott's Debates, page 538.

It is evident that these great men deduced from their impartial study of the question the conclusion that it was necessary to guard against legislative usurpation.

THE RIGHT TO RECOGNIZE THE INDEPENDENCE OR BELLIGERENCY OF A FOREIGN GOVERNMENT IS VESTED EXCLUSIVELY IN THE EXECUTIVE.

I understand that it is generally conceded that the President has the power to recognize belligerency and independence, but it is claimed that this power is not exclusive, and that it is subject to the paramount authority of Congress. However, suggestions have been made to the effect that the Executive does not possess the power at all; that it is purely legislative. I will therefore first consider the subject in that aspect, and if I can show that the power does exist in the Executive, its exclusive character must, I think, be admitted.

It appears to me that if the President has the authority at all, such authority must be exclusive. I can not conceive, as already intimated, that there can be a concurrent delegation of the power to recognize to both Congress and the Executive, and it seems to me clearly untenable to assert that while the President may, if Congress remains passive, recognize belligerency or independence, nevertheless his action can be neutralized or reversed by act of the legislative department. But I will examine this branch of the subject as the argument progresses.

Among Presidential duties is that which authorizes the reception of ambassadors and other public ministers.

Judge Story, perhaps the ablest commentator upon the Constitution, treats this section as follows:

SEC. 1565. The next power is to receive ambassadors and other public ministers. This has been already incidentally touched. A similar power existed under the confederation; but it was confined to receiving "ambassadors," which word, in a strict sense (as has been already stated), comprehends the highest grade only of ministers, and not those of an inferior character. The policy of the United States would ordinarily prefer the employment of the inferior grades; and therefore the description is properly enlarged, so as to include all classes of ministers. Why the receiving of consuls was not also expressly mentioned, as the appointment of them is in the preceding clause, is not easily to be accounted for, especially as the defect of the confederation on this head was fully understood. The power, however, may be fairly inferred from other parts of the Constitution; and, indeed, seems a general incident to the executive authority. It has constantly been exercised without objection; and foreign consuls have never been allowed to discharge any functions of office until they have received the exequatur of the President. Consuls, indeed, are not diplomatic functionaries or political representatives of a foreign nation, but are treated in the character of mere commercial agents.

SEC. 1566. The power to receive ambassadors and ministers is always an important and sometimes a very delicate function, since it constitutes the only accredited medium through which negotiations and friendly relations are ordinarily carried on with foreign powers. A government may, in its discretion, lawfully refuse to receive an ambassador or other minister without its affording any just cause of war. But it would generally be deemed an unfriendly act, and might provoke hostilities unless accompanied by conciliatory explanations. A refusal is sometimes made on the ground of the bad character of the minister, or his former offensive conduct, or of the special subject of the embassy not being proper or convenient for discussion. This, however, is rarely done. But a much more delicate occasion is when a civil war breaks out in a nation, and two nations are formed, or two parties in the same nation, each claiming the sovereignty of the whole, and the contest remains as yet undecided, flagrante bello. In such a case a neutral nation may very properly withhold its recognition of the supremacy of either party or of the existence of two independent nations, and on that account refuse to receive an ambassador from either. It is obvious that in such cases the simple acknowledgment of the minister of either party or nation might be deemed taking part against the other, and thus as affording a strong countenance or opposition to rebellion and civil dismemberment. On this account, nations placed in such a predicament have not hesitated sometimes to declare war against neutrals as interposing in the war, and have made them the victims of their vengeance when they have been anxious to assume a neutral position. The exercise of this prerogative of acknowledging new nations or ministers is therefore, under such circumstances, an executive function of great delicacy, which requires the utmost caution and deliberation. If the Executive receives an ambassador or other minister as the representative of a new nation, or of a party in a civil war in an old nation, it is an acknowledgment of the sovereign authority de facto of such new nation or party. If such recognition is made, it is conclusive upon the nation, unless, indeed, it can be reversed by an act of Congress repudiating it. If, on the other hand, such recognition has been refused by the Executive, it is said that Congress may, notwithstanding, solemnly acknowledge the sovereignty of the nation or party. These, however, are propositions which have hitherto remained as abstract statements under the Constitution, and therefore can be propounded, not as absolutely true, but as still open to discussion if they should ever arise in the course of our foreign diplomacy. The Constitution has expressly invested the Executive with power to receive ambassadors and other ministers. It has not expressly invested Congress with the power either to repudiate or acknowledge them. At all events, in the case of a revolution or dismemberment of a nation, the judiciary can not take notice of any new government or sovereignty until it has been duly recognized by some other department of the Government to whom the power is constitutionally confided.

SEC. 1567. That a power so extensive in its reach over our foreign relations could not be properly conferred on any other than the executive department will admit of little doubt. That it should be exclusively confided to that department, without any participation of the Senate in the functions (that body being conjointly intrusted with the treaty-making power), is not so obvious. Probably the circumstance that in all foreign governments the power was exclusively confided to the executive department, and the utter impracticability of keeping the Senate constantly in session, and the suddenness of the emergencies which might require the action of the Government, conduced to the establishment of the authority in its present form.

Plainly indicating that it was the view of that distinguished jurist that the Constitution had vested this authority not temporarily, not during a recess of Congress, but permanently and exclusively in the executive department. He continues:

It is not, indeed, a power likely to be abused, though it is pregnant with consequences often involving the question of peace or war. And in our own short experience the revolutions in France and the revolutions in South America have already placed us in situations to feel its critical character and the necessity of having at the head of the Government an Executive of sober judgment, enlightened views, and firm and exalted patriotism.

SEC. 1568. As incidents to the power to receive ambassadors and foreign ministers, the President is understood to possess the power to refuse them, and to dismiss those who, having been received, become obnoxious to censure, or unfit to be allowed the privilege by their improper conduct, or by political events. While, however, they are permitted to remain as public functionaries, they are entitled to all the immunities and rights which the law of nations has provided at once for their dignity, their independence, and their inviolability.

In a note to Judge Story's work we find the following:

NOTE 1.—It is surprising that The Federalist should have treated the power of receiving ambassadors and other public ministers as an Executive function of little intrinsic importance. Its language is, "This, though it has been a rich theme of declamation, is more a matter of dignity than of authority. It is a circumstance which will be without consequence in the administration of the Government. And it was far more convenient that it should be arranged in this manner than that there should be a necessity of convening the Legislature, or one of its branches, upon every arrival of a foreign minister, though it were merely to take the place of a departed predecessor.—The Federalist, No. 69, page 421.

It is perhaps fair, let me observe, to assume that the attack made upon this provision did not arrest great attention. The avowed purpose of The Federalist was to discuss only objections made by the opponents of the proposed plan, which seemed to be serious. The failure to regard this provision as of vital import was not astonishing because of the absence of circumstances which eventuated in later years. That The Federalist was not always conclusive, appears by reference to No. 77, where it is expressly stated that the President possesses the power to remove officers only by or with the advice and consent of the Senate—a misconception long indulged in. (See 5 Op. Atty. Gen. (Crittenden), 290, 291.)

Judge Story, in that portion of the commentaries to which I have alluded, says:

If, on the other hand, such recognition has been refused by the Executive, it is said that Congress may, notwithstanding, solemnly acknowledge the sovereignty of a nation or party.

It will be noted that the learned commentator does not adopt this opinion, but the authority to which he refers is Rawle on the Constitution, chapter 20, pages 195, 196. Mr. Rawle published his commentaries in 1825. Although his work was exceedingly valuable, yet some of his conclusions were found to be untenable, and the book has practically passed out of print. It is not easy to discover where Mr. Rawle found the authority for his statement, and his contention is successfully combated by Judge Story, not only in the comments which I have read, but in a decision by that great jurist to which I will in a moment allude. Judge Story's work was published in 1833, and afterwards, and while he was an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, he rendered the decision in Williams vs. The Suffolk Insurance Company (3 Sumner, 272 et seq.). He there said:

The Government of Buenos Ayres insists that the Falkland Islands constitute a part of the dominions within its sovereignty, and, consequently, that it has the sole jurisdiction to regulate and prohibit the seal fishery at those islands, and to punish any violation of its laws by a confiscation of the vessels and property engaged therein. On the other hand, the American Government insists that the Falkland Islands do not constitute any part of the dominions within the sovereignty of Buenos Ayres; and that the seal fishery at those islands is a trade free and lawful to the citizens of the United States, and beyond the competency of the Buenos Ayres Government to regulate, prohibit, or punish. The controversy is still undisposed of by the two Governments, each maintaining its own claims and pretensions, and neither admitting the claims or pretensions of the other. In this state of the diplomacy between the two countries, while the whole matter is in contestation between them, or, as we may say, flagrante lite, the question is whether it is competent for this court to reexamine and decide, in its judicial capacity, upon the claims and pretensions of the two Governments, and thus to interpose its positive umpirage to settle the matters in dispute, at least to the extent required for the proper adjudication of the cases now before it.

It will be noted the issue was clearly presented. The material, the vital, the relevant issue was whether the islands named belonged or did not belong within a certain jurisdiction, and therein was involved the other question as to whether a determination had been legally reached upon that subject. He continues:

My judgment is that this court possesses no such authority, and that it is bound up by the doctrines and claims insisted on by its own government, and that it must take them to be rightful until the contrary is established by some formal and authorized action of that government.

Now, let us see how the "government" alluded to manifested its decision.

I wish to direct the attention of the Senate particularly to this judicial announcement:

It is very clear, that it belongs exclusively to the executive department of our Government to recognize, from time to time, any new governments which "may arise in the political revolutions of the world; and until such new governments are so recognized, they can not be admitted by our courts of justice to have or to exercise the common rights and prerogatives of sovereignty."

Mr. President, here is a decision handed down in 1838, which clearly announces the doctrine for which the present Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, contends, and which has been lately condemned as revolutionary. Here it is announced from the bench by one of the ablest jurists who ever presided over a court, clearly and positively, that the power to recognize is not only vested in the Executive, but that such an investiture is exclusive.

The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the judgment in Williams vs. The Suffolk Insurance Company (13 Peters, 420), using this language:

And can there be any doubt that when the executive branch of the Government, which is charged with our foreign relations, shall in its correspondence with a foreign nation assume a fact in regard to the sovereignty of any island or country, it is conclusive on the judicial department? And in this view it is not material to inquire, nor is it the province of the court to determine, whether the Executive be right or wrong. It is enough to know that in the exercise of his constitutional functions he has decided the question. Having done this under the responsibilities which belong to him, it is obligatory on the people and Government of the Union.

If this were not the rule, cases might often arise in which, on the most important questions of foreign jurisdiction, there would be an irreconcilable difference between the executive and judicial departments. By one of these departments a foreign island or country might be considered as at peace with the United States, whilst the other would consider it in a state of war. No well-regulated government has ever sanctioned a principle so unwise and so destructive of national character.

And yet, Mr. President, we have heard it asserted again and again that this doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States—the declared judgment of the highest judicial tribunal known to our law, promulgated many years ago—is unprecedented. It has been even intimated that the Secretary of State who proclaimed it risked impeachment. Perhaps it may be a crime to declare the law. It is clear that the Supreme Court believed that the President in recognizing independence on his own responsibility did so "in the exercise of his constitutional functions."

I know that it was said by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that those portions of these decisions which relate to Executive jurisdiction are obiter dicta. It may be that it was unnecessary to decide whether or not the Executive authority was exclusive; but it is plain that the jurisdiction of the Executive to effectively recognize independence was a material issue absolutely necessary to the decision of the case. These authorities are conclusive of the existence of Executive control if the Supreme Court has any jurisdiction to settle such questions. If the Executive, without Congress, can not recognize, then the basis of the court's decision drops out.

My object in citing this case is to disclose the views entertained by Judge Story and his associates. That jurist had considered the subject in his commentaries, as I have shown, and hence his attention had been specially directed to the matter, and he had also in mind Mr. Rawle's view already referred to, and upon which he had commented, and, taking the expressions contained in the commentaries and those found in the decision in 3 Sumner above mentioned, it is obvious that it was the carefully thought-out opinion of Judge Story that the authority to recognize was exclusively in the Executive.

I have had occasion to consider this topic to some extent when resolutions advising a recognition of belligerency were before the Senate, and I then referred to several adjudications, and I shall take the liberty of again citing some of them in brief.

In 2 Black, 670, I find the following:

> Whether the President, in fulfilling his duties as commander-in-chief in suppressing an insurrection, has met with such armed hostile resistance and a civil war of such alarming proportions as will compel him to accord to them the character of belligerents, is a question to be decided by him, and this court must be governed by the decisions and acts of the political department of the Government, to which this power was intrusted. He must determine what degree of force the crisis demands.

It is plain that it was the opinion of the Supreme Court that the President was authorized and was the proper party to find the facts as to belligerency. It is true that the conflict involved was domestic, but the citation is nevertheless relevant. It will be noted that "political department" is used as synonymous with "executive department." Judge Story evidently thought that the word "government" was used as equivalent to "executive department" in Gelston vs. Hoyt (3 Wheat., 324), because that case is referred to by him in Williams vs. Suffolk Insurance Company as upholding the jurisdiction in the President to proclaim belligerency.

In Kennett vs. Chambers (14 How., 50, 51), Chief Justice Taney said:

> It is not necessary in the case before us to decide how far the judicial tribunals of the United States would enforce a contract like this, when two States, acknowledged to be independent, were at war and this country neutral. It is a sufficient answer to the argument to say that the question whether Texas had or had not at that time become an independent State was a question for that department of our Government exclusively which is charged with our foreign relations, and until the period when that department recognized it as an independent State, the judicial tribunals of the country were bound to consider the old order of things as having continued and to regard Texas as a part of the Mexican territory.

In alluding to the constitutional power, or rather to the power of the President derived from the Constitution with reference to our foreign relations, I beg leave to quote from Chancellor Kent. Said that very able man:

> The President is the constitutional organ of communication with foreign powers.

It was evidently the view of that able jurist that the Presidential duty in this respect was not derived from any statute and did not depend upon the will of Congress.

Again he says:

> The power of receiving foreign ministers includes in it the power to dismiss them, since he (the President) alone is the organ of communication with them, the representative of the people—

Not the representative of Congress, but "the representative of the people"— > in all diplomatic negotiations, and accountable to the community not only for the execution of the law, but for competent qualifications and conduct of foreign agents.

It is to be noted that according to this statement the President is the representative of the people in all diplomatic negotiations, and he is said to be accountable to the community. There is no intimation that he is accountable to Congress in this regard. He derives the authority from a higher source, from the people. He rests upon the consent of the governed, as evidenced by the Constitution.

During the recent Chilean difficulty it was held by the district court of the United States for the southern district of California as follows:

> It is beyond question that the status of the people composing the Congressional party at the time of the commission of the alleged offense is to be regarded by the court as it was then regarded by the political or executive department of the United States. This doctrine is firmly established. (U. S. vs. Trumbull, 49 Fed., 99, 104.)

And in the Itata case (56 Fed., 510) Judge Hawley, speaking for the circuit court of appeals, said:

> The law is well settled that it is the duty of the courts to regard the status of the Congressional party in the same light as they were regarded by the executive department of the United States at the time the alleged offenses were committed.

It thus appears that whenever our courts have been called on to solve an issue which depends upon the existence or nonexistence of a nation they have turned uniformly to the executive, and have accepted the determination of that department as conclusive and binding upon them. Can it be, Mr. President, that this jurisdiction thus affirmed by our judiciary and announced for years and years by all the departments of our Government rests pro hâc vice only in the Executive, and that his authority is of such flimsy tenure that it is subject to Congress; that he is possessed of the power to recognize only when Congress does not see fit to withdraw it from him? Is there any scheme in the organic law for an appeal from Executive action in this matter? Either the power to recognize is vested in the Executive or it is not. If the right is conceded, then, in the absence of any constitutional limitation, it must, I assert, be exclusive. That he does not derive it from any act of Congress is obvious, for no one has pointed to an act of Congress presuming or pretending to give him any such right.

I have said, Mr. President, in line, as I take it, with the authorities on which I have been commenting and to which I have attempted to attract the attention of the Senate, that if it be conceded that the Executive has the power to recognize independence, then, unless there can be pointed out in the Constitution some limitation of that power, some appellate jurisdiction in Congress, some restriction upon it, something justifying the conclusion that in the absence of Presidential exercise of that authority it may be assumed by Congress, the conclusion inevitably follows that the Presidential prerogative is attached to that office only, and that the President either derives his authority from the Constitution or he does not possess it at all. It further appears evident that if the Executive may recognize independence, the debate is at an end as to the point now considered, and the position of the Secretary of State is justified.

Mr. Wharton, whose abilities as a lawyer and as an author and whose researches into matters pertaining to international affairs earned for him high reputation throughout the civilized world, compiled a digest on the international law of the United States, pursuant to authority given by Congress and under the Congressional eye, and this work comes nearer constituting an accepted American text-book upon this subject than any other treatise. In discussing this subject, he heads the section with reference to belligerency as follows: "Such recognition (i. e.), belligerency determinable by Executive," and he cites with apparent approval a statement of Secretary Seward in his letter to Mr. Dayton, wherein it is said:

> It is, however, another and distinct question whether the United States would think it necessary or proper to express themselves in the form adopted by the House of Representatives. This is a practically and purely executive question, and the decision of it constitutionally belongs not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President of the United States.

He was discussing at that time a proceeding in the House of Representatives touching the recognition of the alleged newly formed Government of Mexico, pertaining to a protest made by the House of Representatives, wherein they affirmed their hostility to the encroachments of monarchic powers within the confines of a sister republic. Mr. Seward thus asserted jurisdiction—exclusive jurisdiction—in the Executive, and in so doing he followed the line of precedents heretofore mentioned, and from which the State Department has deduced a uniform rule of conduct, and has regarded the claim of exclusive right in the Executive as based upon the correct interpretation of the Constitution.

While the Executive has rarely, as in the case of President Jackson in the Texas matter, sought the advice of Congress as to such issues, this advice has never been asked as signifying a doubt of the executive claim, or an assertion that the jurisdiction rested elsewhere than in the Executive. The opinion of Congress has been solicited merely in an advisory way. Congress often seeks to advise without being requested so to do, and may, I presume, when solicited, contribute the notions of its members. The value of such advice is quite another thing. No legal force can be affirmed of it.

A question touching this topic was passed on by Chief Justice Marshall in United States vs. Hutchings (2 Wheeler Crim. Cases, 546). The opinion of that able jurist is thus given by the reporter:

> The court decided that the commissions shall go to the jury merely as papers found on board the vessel; but on the main question the court was of opinion that a nation became independent from its declaration of independence only as respects its own government and the various departments thereof; that before it could be considered independent by the judiciary of foreign nations it was necessary that its independence should be recognized by the executive authority of those nations; that as our Executive had never recognized the independence of Buenos Ayres, it was not competent to the court to pronounce its independence.

It may be argued that here again the court's conclusion is obiter dictum, but it was material whether the country in question had been acknowledged to be independent, and the judgment of the Chief Justice that that acknowledgment should be by the Executive contains his opinion as to the character of recognition which must take place before the fact can be judicially assumed. The concurrence of opinion between Marshall, Story, and Taney, and other able jurists quoted, ought certainly be sufficient to relieve the Secretary of State from the charge of advancing a new and absurd claim—an accusation, it may be noted, which has been flippantly urged by some of the most widely circulated newspapers in the country and by persons in official position who ought to know better. It sometimes happens that an unfriendly feeling toward an individual or an officer begets ill-advised comment.

In The Ambrose Light (25 Fed., 443), Judge Brown says:

The additional facts proved show, however, such a subsequent implied recognition by our Government of the insurgent forces as a government de facto in a state of war with Colombia and entitled to belligerent rights as should prevent the condemnation of the vessel as prize. A communication from the Department of State to the Colombian minister, bearing date the day of the seizure, seems to me to constitute such a recognition by necessary implication.

Here, therefore, the court not only conceded the right of the President to recognize belligerency, but even held that such recognition was accomplished unintentionally by an executive communication. The action of the Executive, so taken and not designed to recognize belligerency, nevertheless fixed the legal status of this vessel, and justified a judgment against the Government and relieved the vessel from condemnation as prize.

The point determined was obviously material. I am aware that it has been said here, I believe without too much consideration, that we are not bound by the decisions of the courts. In one sense this may be true. As far as voting is concerned, we are scarcely bound by anything. When our names are called, we may vote as we please. But if we can not accept the construction placed upon the organic law for many, many years, for three or four generations, by our ablest judges, we are certainly inconsistent with the attitude which some of us assume in criticising the Supreme Court because it has lately changed its opinion as to certain propositions.

Mr. Blaine, May 9, 1881, in a letter to Minister Christiancy, said:

If the Calderon Government is supported by the character and intelligence of Peru, and is really endeavoring to restore constitutional government, with a view both to order within and negotiation with Chile for peace, you may recognize it as the existing provisional government and render what aid you can by advice and good offices to that end. Mr. Elmore has been received by me as the confidential agent of such provisional government.

As has already been remarked, it is well settled in diplomacy that the reception of a minister or agent vested with diplomatic functions is a recognition of the existence of the government which has sent the envoy here. Mr. Blaine did not consider it necessary to consult Congress upon this subject. He acted upon the theory that Congress had no authority in the premises.

President Arthur, in his third annual message (1883), in speaking of the difficulties between Chile and Peru, and especially with reference to the uncertain nature of the government of the last-named country, said:

Meanwhile the provisional government of General Iglesias has applied for recognition to the principal powers of America and Europe. If the will of the Peruvian people would be manifested, I shall not hesitate to recognize the government approved by them.

In the message thus sent by President Arthur to the Congress of the United States, and regarding which no unfavorable comment has ever been made here or elsewhere, he wrote, "I shall not hesitate to recognize," etc. President Arthur used the personal pronoun, and seemed to have no doubt of his right to completely recognize independence when, in his official judgment, the occasion might arise.

Can there be such a thing as incomplete recognition of the independence of a government resulting from the declaration of the President seeking to directly recognize it? If the President of the United States to-day receives a minister from the alleged Republic of Cuba, would there be any doubt that that formal reception of the minister would be conclusive of the fact that the new government had been recognized as an independent state?

When Dom Pedro relinquished his claim to the Brazilian throne, President Harrison acted promptly, and in his message to Congress (Foreign Relations 1890, page 4) he says:

Toward the end of the past year the only independent monarchical government on the Western Continent, that of Brazil, ceased to exist, and was succeeded by a republic. Diplomatic relations were at once established with the new government, but it was not completely recognized—until an opportunity had been afforded to ascertain that it had popular approval and support. When the course of events had yielded assurance of this fact, no time was lost in extending to the new government a full and cordial welcome into the family of American commonwealths.

Mark the phrase—

Mark the phrases "completely recognized," "full * * * welcome into the family of American commonwealths." Is a "complete" or "full" recognition subject to Congressional reversal? Here, therefore, is another Presidential communication to Congress, directly stating that the Executive not only recognized the Brazilian Government, but that he has left nothing to be done to complete the acknowledgement. No one has challenged the efficacy of that recognition, and I again ask, Will anyone say that Congress might have risen in its constitutional might and, by the passage of a resolution, made void that which the President made complete?

On December 9, 1891, President Harrison, in a message to Congress, stated that which I shall read. These communications were not confidential; they were notoriously made. The country knew all about them. They were printed as Congressional documents, and placed upon the desks of Senators and Representatives, and constitute a portion of the history of this Union. President Harrison said:

The civil war in Chile, which began in January last, was continued, but fortunately with infrequent and not important armed collisions, until August 28, when the Congressional forces landed near Valparaiso and, after a bloody engagement, captured that city. President Balmaceda at once recognized that his cause was lost, and a provisional government was speedily established by the victorious party. Our minister was promptly directed to recognize and put himself in communication with this government so soon as it should have established its de facto character, which was done.

Hence the President, without consulting Congress, without asking for the approval of Congress, without seeking the ratification of his act, without submitting to any further scrutiny than every communication upon the state of the Union must have in this and the other body, sent instructions to Chile, to the American minister, directing him, in virtue of the Executive authority, to recognize the changed condition.

He also recognized the new Government of the Hawaiian Islands under circumstances which were, to say the least, novel. His ability to do this was never doubted, though the wisdom of its exercise was questioned.

The references which I have thus made evince the uniform and unchallenged assertion of Executive jurisdiction, and whatever may be the true construction of the Constitution, the power asserted was complete, absolute, and effective. No action of Congress was needed to ratify or approve. If there is any Congressional power to repudiate such recognition, it can be found nowhere in the Constitution, but is based upon the notion that Congress has powers not granted, and has the right to draw to itself all functions not accorded to or exercised by the other Departments, a contention absolutely in conflict with that organic provision which reserves to the people the powers not granted.

The exclusive right of the Executive has been maintained in almost every instance, the exceptions being where the Executive thought it well to consult Congress, as did President Jackson in the Texas case. But even there he did not relinquish or doubt his authority.

Mr. President, we are apt to confuse the true interpretation of our duty with the result toward which our inclinations point. When we seek to reach a desirable end, or when we find an independent officer exercising his authority in a manner differing from our ideas of propriety, we are too apt to seek to extend the limits of our domain and to interfere with subjects intrusted by law to other hands. Hence it is that legislators differing from the Executive endeavor to defend their criticisms by assuming unwarranted jurisdiction.

The exclusive right of the Executive has been maintained, as I have said, in almost every instance. President Jackson did not recognize the jurisdiction of Congress to do anything more than to advise. He was willing to act upon such advice, not because it was necessary for him to do so, but because in the discharge of his Executive power he thought it better to do so. Nor is there anything in the resolution which was passed by Congress at that time assuming any greater authority or power than the giving of advice. There are expressions to be found, notably in remarks by Mr. Clay, not altogether consistent, I may say, upon this subject, indicating to some extent that he believed Congress had authority in the premises. We have had such claims of power here, but we have no case where Congress has ousted Executive jurisdiction, or where the proclamation of the Executive upon this subject has ever been repudiated. It seems to me a most peculiar view to assert that there is jurisdiction here not only to upset that which has been done, but to perform acts which it is thought ought to have been performed, but which the Executive has declined to do, and which the Constitution provides, if done at all, shall be done by the President.

In the memorandum upon the power to recognize the independence of a new foreign state (Senate Document No. 56, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session) a large number of authorities are collated which it is unnecessary to review here. The references to the debates concerning the South American revolutions are quite interesting as demonstrating that at that very early date it was generally conceded that the jurisdiction was with the Executive.

Volume 4, page 71, Memoirs, John Quincy Adams, we find that that statesman has made the following entry with reference to a conversation with Mr. Monroe:

The President told me that last evening a member of the Senate came to him and asked him if at the Cabinet meetings before the commencement of the session of Congress the determination was taken not to acknowledge the Government of Buenos Ayres, professedly to the end that Congress might take the lead in this measure. And this was now inquired obviously with a view to justify the present conduct of Mr. Clay. The President answered that at that time the questions were proposed whether the Executive was competent to acknowledge the independence of Buenos Ayres, and, if so, whether it was expedient; that it had been concluded the Executive was competent; but that it was not expedient to take the step without the certainty of being supported in it by the public opinion, which, if decidedly favorable to the measure, would be manifested by measures of Congress. Mr. Monroe added if Mr. Clay had taken the ground that the Executive had gone as far as he could go with propriety toward the acknowledgment of the South Americans, that he was well disposed to go further, if such were the feeling of the nation and of Congress, and had made his motion with that view, to ascertain the real sentiments of Congress, it might have been in perfect harmony with the Executive. But between that and the angry, acrimonious course pursued by Mr. Clay there was a wide difference.

This plainly shows that Mr. Monroe himself believed that the power to recognize is in the President, but he was not averse to consulting those whose right to nullify his acts he denied. But he made no intimation that there was any question as to the exclusiveness of Presidential jurisdiction.

He spoke also, as shown by these quoted remarks, of public opinion. He was naturally anxious to discover the sentiments of the people, though he did not design sacrificing his constitutional power or abdicating any of his constitutional privileges, whatever might be the opinion either of Congress or of the people. He recognized unquestionably that as the servant of the people it was his duty to maintain the laws which had been provided for his guidance, and which he must follow until the people in their sovereign capacity established a different system.

On page 204 of the same memoirs we find the following:

My draft of a dispatch to R. Rush was read. They were all startled at the paragraph announcing it as the President's intention at no remote period to recognize the Government of Buenos Ayres.

The whole conversation, everything that was said—and the remarks are set forth at some length in his memoirs—goes to show that the people, that the Congress, all interested, were anticipating the decision of the Executive upon the matter then pending. That Mr. Monroe asserted the jurisdiction in himself, and that he intended to see that it remained where the Constitution had placed it, no one can deny.

The following significant expressions appear in the same diary, on page 205:

Mr. Crawford now said that if the acknowledgment was to take place, he should prefer making it in another form, not by granting an "exequatur" to a consul, but by sending a minister there; because the Senate must then act upon the nomination, which would give their sanction to the measure. Mr. Wirt added that the House of Representatives must also concur by assenting to an act of appropriation. And the President, laughing, said that as those bodies had the power of impeachment over us, it would be quite convenient to have them thus pledged beforehand.

I said my impressions were altogether different. I would make the acknowledgment as simple and unostentatious as possible, with as little change in the actual state of things as could be. I thought it not consistent with our national dignity to be the first in sending a minister to a new power. It had not been done by any European power to ourselves. If an exchange of ministers was to take place, the first should come from them. As to impeachment, I was willing to take my share of risk of it for this measure whenever the Executive should deem it proper. And instead of admitting the Senate or House of Representatives to any share in the act of recognition, I would expressly avoid that form of doing it which would require the concurrence of those bodies. It was, I had no doubt, by our Constitution an act of the Executive authority. General Washington had exercised it in recognizing the French Republic by the reception of Mr. Genêt. Mr. Madison had exercised it by declining for several years to receive, and by finally receiving, Mr. Onis; and in this instance I thought the Executive ought carefully to preserve entire the authority given him by the Constitution, and not weaken it by setting the precedent of making either House of Congress a party to an act which it was his exclusive right and duty to perform.

Crawford said he did not think there was anything in the objection to sending a minister on the score of national dignity, and that there was a difference between the recognition of a change of government in a nation already acknowledged as sovereign and the recognition of a new nation itself. He did not however deny, but admitted, that the recognition was strictly within the powers of the Executive alone, and I did not press the discussion further.

Therefore not only did the Secretary of State in that discussion, and not only did other members of the Cabinet concede and hold the existence of this exclusive power in the President, but the President himself, while believing it to be wise to obtain the approval of Congress, so believed only because of the Congressional power to appropriate and for the reason that he wished that matters should proceed without friction. No intimation is contained at any place in this discussion or in the detailed report of what occurred at that time to warrant any doubt that Mr. Monroe himself held the same views now entertained by Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Olney.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from California allow me?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from California if he does not agree that a declaration of war against a foreign district or country is a recognition of it as a sovereign power?

Mr. WHITE. Such a declaration is undoubtedly an assumption of the existence of a power against which war could be declared. This is certainly true.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose, for instance, Cuba had practically maintained her independence of Spain, Spain being utterly unable to help herself, and Cuba had committed hostile acts upon our commerce, is not the power in Congress to declare war with Cuba, as the power is in Congress to regulate commerce with Cuba, under such circumstances, with all the incidents that follow?

Mr. WHITE. Congress may declare war against a nation or it can regulate commerce with a nation. An act of Congress declaring war does not by its terms create independence or declare that status. The declaration assumes the status, however.

Mr. HOAR. So we could not have a treaty of peace?

Mr. WHITE. Well, we could have a treaty; I concede that. A treaty is initiated by the Executive, and the Senate advises and consents.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me a moment. I do not want to interfere with his argument. I put this question in support of the conclusion to which I had myself arrived, which is, I think, the one which was in the thought of President Jackson, and perhaps would reconcile every expression which is to be found in our history.

It is very clear that this is an incident, however great or important it is. The power in the Executive is clearly incident to the power not merely to send ambassadors, but to invite the sending of ambassadors from abroad, as the Senator has so well shown, and I agree with the Senator that it is a power which necessarily must continue all the year round, and may be exercised on an hour's notice sometimes, and it can not be exercised by Congress for that reason. But it seems to me, with great respect, that while it is incident to the treaty-making power of which the President is a part, as the Senator said, it is also an incident of certain constitutional powers of Congress. Yet these powers never will be brought into conflict, although they may reside to a limited extent in both. But the question we are dealing with is not whether Congress may have it as incident to the power to regulate commerce, not whether Congress may have it as incident to the power to declare war, not whether Congress may have it as incident to its power of legislation over the conduct of American citizens, not as an incident or consequence; our question now is, Does it rest in Congress primarily and originally before any of these other constitutional things are done?

Now, I agree with the Senator that the very necessity of the case makes it an executive power, and an executive power alone, where nothing is to be done but recognition. So this is a very grave matter that we should not concede unless the Constitution requires it, that the power of recognizing a foreign country may sometimes be a necessary incident to some constitutional legislative power of Congress; and I hope that nothing will occur in this discussion on either side which will amount to a limitation or abridgment of that power. The Senator will pardon me for the interruption.

Mr. WHITE. It is true that the question to which I am immediately addressing myself is the attempt absolutely and directly by a joint resolution to recognize the independence of another government.

Mr. HOAR. As incident to nothing?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir; predicated upon nothing incidentally. The resolution directly deals with the subject. It is confined to that specific topic alone. I am not here to enter into a discussion as to the effect of indirect legislation which Congress may perhaps at some time see fit to enact in conflict with Executive view. It is always dangerous to seek the discussion of irrelevant subjects, or to attempt the adoption of rules to govern cases not yet presented.

As far as a declaration of war or a treaty of commerce are concerned, both presuppose the existence of nationality upon which the declaration or legislation may be operative, but whether in the exercise of our constitutional power of passing a bill regulating commerce, concurred in by the Executive, a peculiar collateral consequence may result, I do not propose at this hour to elaborately consider. Such a course would be foreign to the purpose I have at hand. I am endeavoring to show that, as far as the attempt to directly recognize a revolutionary organization goes, it is not within our sphere. Whether indirect action of Congress might result in the assumption of another national existence, it is not certain that such assumption could absolutely create a nation. But this is speculative. I do not believe that any such conflict of authority or peculiar combination of circumstances will ever be manifested. I could add that we might readily hold commercial relations with communities not constituting a nation. This Government has continued moving in the present channel for many years without, I think, any substantial deviation in practice from the course to which I have alluded.

I do not feel prepared to change our procedure now. The citations which I made from Mr. Adams's account of Mr. Monroe's statement are interesting, and are certainly sufficient to acquit the Executive or the Secretary of State from the charge of asserting anything new. The specific proposition contended for by the present Administration is that in the case of Cuba Congress has not the power directly to declare independence, or even belligerency. I have stated that I believe that contention to be well founded, and I have sought to fortify my opinion by referring to precedent and to principle.

Mr. President, it is clear that the Constitution does not make it the duty of Congress, nor does it give to either House, the authority to receive ambassadors or ministers. This function is conferred upon the President only. It has been suggested that this delegation of authority amounts to nothing more than the enjoining of a duty to extend proper courtesies to diplomatic officers coming from abroad. With due respect, it appears to me that this argument has nothing in reason to sustain it. Can we afford to urge that as important an instrument as the Constitution, upon which our governmental framework absolutely rests, is devoted to any extent or at all to a mere matter of etiquette? The duty which the President must perform under the organic law with relation to ambassadors and ministers is not merely to grasp their hands or to otherwise salute them in the most approved method of the day; nor is it exhausted or even exercised by giving invitations to receptions or dinners. It means more than this. As the Executive is granted the power to receive, so he is accorded the right to determine to whom such reception should be vouchsafed. He receives officially if he believes that the party presenting himself is not only individually the sort of a man who ought to be received, but he also is bound to determine whether he in fact represents a foreign power.

Necessarily this authority to determine is involved in the discharge of the duty to receive. When a person offering himself at the Executive Mansion claims that he is entitled to be received as a minister, the President, from the very nature of the case, is compelled to decide whether his pretensions are well founded, and in doing this he is bound to find on the issue as to whether the applicant represents a foreign power. Thus the alleged minister of the Cuban Republic seeks to meet the Executive; Mr. Cleveland refuses to receive him, because he declares that the minister does not represent a foreign power. Congress can not dictate to the President as to who he shall receive, for the simple reason that the duty to receive being constitutionally delegated to him, he must determine for himself whether a case has arisen calling for the exercise of that power. It is the duty of Congress to pass laws to govern the country, but it is within its sole discretion to enact or not to enact. If we refuse to appropriate a dollar for public purposes we might be and would be derelict, but no court could mandamus us, because Congress judges for itself as to whether a case has arisen calling for the exercise of its functions.

The President may act badly; indeed, his conduct may justify impeachment. So Congress may behave in an outrageous manner, and the people may be without any further remedy than that which is expressed at the polls. No scheme of government ever devised can insure ability and honesty upon the part of those intrusted with power, and there is no individual or officer to whom authority has been delegated who may not violate his obligations and work evil. But the accomplishment of such regrettable results is no argument against jurisdiction. It must be remembered that the existence of jurisdiction may well mean the power to do not only that which is right, but also that which is wrong.

Where is there a word in the organic law indicating preference for Congressional jurisdiction? The legislative limitations therein prescribed were suggested by ages of experience. Danger lurks in excited multitudes and appears in the consequences of uprisings and insurrections as well as in the remorseless mandates of kingly power. The fathers sought to guard against extremes. The delegation of authority to the Executive was designed to confer exclusive jurisdiction to the extent indicated. Concurrent jurisdiction in such a matter as this would be confusing and lead to perilous disputation. The power thus accorded is not and never will be subject to appeal. Congress must pass a bill over the Presidential veto, because the Constitution so declares; but Congress can not, by bill, modify or abrogate the Executive authority with reference to foreign relations, and especially with regard to receiving ambassadors and ministers. So also of the legislative and executive jurisdictions. Were it otherwise, the whole scheme would be a failure. If the legislative department is preferred, this means that the executive and judicial departments exist only in subordination to Congress, whose edicts are in fact supreme. This position is not only violative of the words of the Constitution, but in conflict with the often expressed intentions of the fathers. It has no support in our history. It is revolutionary, and destructive of that independence without which the Presidential office can never be properly exercised.

SOME OF THE DIFFICULTIES OF THE CONTRARY POSITION.

It is intimated that the President has the power to recognize, but it is said that this is only a conditional grant. It is limited in some mode. It exists now, and it may not exist to-morrow. This position I repudiate, for I find no direct grant to Congress justifying such a conclusion; nor does it appear to me that such authority is granted anywhere by implication, or is the necessary attendant of any authority specifically delegated. If the President recognizes the belligerency or independence of the Cuban Republic, can Congress repudiate such recognition? I take it that this is not possible. If the Presidential recognition of belligerency is valid in any case, in what case is it invalid? And if the President has authority to absolutely recognize independence in any case, is not that authority the result of discretion conferred upon him by the Constitution? And such discretion involves the ability to refuse as well as to grant, and if it is not competent for Congress to nullify Presidential recognition of belligerency or independence, can Congress render nugatory the decision of the President denying such recognition? I think that I have already shown that the framers of the Constitution were not engaged in the business of guarding Congress against the President, but that they felt the necessity of so organizing the Houses that they could not subordinate Presidential jurisdiction within allotted lines save in one mode, to wit, impeachment.

The plenary authority exercised by the President in foreign affairs is exemplified to some extent not only in receiving ministers, but even in providing for the exercise by foreign consuls of authority within the United States.

When the British consul at Charleston, at the beginning of the late civil war, acted in a manner contrary to the wishes of Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet, the exequatur was revoked and Mr. Bunch's powers terminated. No consultation was had with Congress upon this subject. It is discretionary with the President to refuse an exequatur, although, as Mr. Blaine declared in his letter to Mr. Morgan, May 31, 1881 (1 Whar. Int. Law, page 765), the exercise of that undoubted right is an extreme one, rarely resorted to here.

Instances of the dismissal of ministers are numerous. We remember very clearly the action of Mr. Cleveland in demanding the recall of Minister West, owing to his correspondence with an alleged British subject called, for the time being, Murchison. No power was conferred by Congress upon the President, but he, having the right to control the matter, exercised his prerogative at his discretion.

In Schuyler's American Diplomacy, page 136, I find the following:

It may be mentioned here that our Government has never been slow to use its right in asking for the recall of, or of sending away, a foreign minister who becomes obnoxious. The recall of Mr. Genêt, the French minister, was asked in 1793; that of Mr. Jackson, the British minister, in 1809; that of Mr. Poussin, the French minister, in 1849; Mr. Crampton, the British minister, was given his passports in 1856; and intercourse ceased with Mr. Catacazy, the Russian minister, in 1871.

In all those cases the act was the act of the Executive; it was the result of Executive discretion; there was no participancy by the legislative department, and none claimed.

If Congress possesses the power to settle the question of belligerency or independence, it is clear that all sources of material information ought to be open to investigation and examination.

I beg leave to refer to remarks made by me on a former occasion touching this question:

There is another ground which appears to me very strong in support of the contention that the recognition power is lodged in the Executive. There is before the Senate a document which was read by the Senator from Alabama, and which I deem quite important. I refer to House Document 224 of the present session. I read a few lines for purposes of illustration:

"No. 2699.] CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
"Habana, January 7, 1896.

"SIR: With reference to the proclamation of the Captain-General of the 2d instant declaring a state of war to exist in the provinces of Habana and Pinar del Rio, copy and translation of which accompanied my dispatch No. 2695 of the 4th instant"—

At this point I find a note stating that the proclamation mentioned is not printed. From this I conclude that the omitted paper has not been revealed to Congress. No one appears to controvert this supposition. When the House adopted the resolution calling for this correspondence it did so in the following phraseology:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives, if not inconsistent with the public interests, copies of all correspondence relating to affairs in Cuba since February last."

The House passed the usual resolution in the regular form which custom authorizes. Manifestly information has been withheld—no doubt properly. Time out of mind, if I may use that expression with reference to this very modern Government, it has been the custom to withhold information, the disclosure of which the Executive deems incompatible with public interest. The document thus legitimately withheld may contain essential and controlling facts upon this subject. That it is important would seem to follow to some extent from the very circumstance that it is retained. Has the Executive the right to thus deny information? Our Chief Magistrates have always done so, pursuant to unchallenged custom and in compliance with recognized usage, evidenced by many hundred resolutions calling upon the Executive for diplomatic information. The President is not directed; he is merely requested, and always with the qualification which I have noted. The Executive right to withhold delicate diplomatic correspondence is incidental to the Presidential office. Can it be that the Constitution has placed upon Congress the burden of deciding and the duty to determine issues concerning belligerent or other relations to foreign powers and has not at the same time compelled the President to give us everything within his knowledge? Can it be that we are to pass upon a part of the case and not upon the whole? Can it be that under the law we are deprived of material evidence and yet are expected to render final and determinative judgment upon an imperfect record—a fraction of the aggregate proof? I say not. The President has before him all information. He reviews a complete history. Plainly, he is in a better condition to judge of the true state of affairs than are we. He has the means to secure all relevant information.

Having in charge the diplomatic relations of the Government, he is, or should be, better advised than the Senate or the House of Representatives, or both.

It was early settled that the Executive could not be compelled to surrender up to both Houses of Congress information which that officer deemed to be of such a character as to render it inadvisable to make a disclosure.

When President Washington sent in the proposed treaty with Great Britain, a question arose as to whether the President had any right to negotiate a treaty of commerce (2 Marshall's Washington, page 377). Mr. Livingstone offered a resolution in the House requesting the President to furnish a copy of the instructions to the minister of the United States who negotiated the treaty with Great Britain. Mr. Madison proposed to amend so as to except such papers as, in the judgment of the President, it might be inconsistent with the interests of the United States at this time to disclose (id., page 378). This proposition was rejected, and the resolution offered by Mr. Livingstone was passed by a vote of 62 to 37. Afterwards the President communicated to the House his refusal, and in concluding it he said:

As it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office under all the circumstances of this case forbid a compliance with your request. (Id., 381.)

I can not find that the power of the President to retain information the disclosure of which he deems incompatible with the public interest has ever been doubted, and the uniform practice of Congress admits this power. We do not direct the President nor do we seek to compel him to make disclosures against his own judgment. On the contrary, the Presidential discretion is in terms conceded in every resolution seeking information from the State Department which Congress sees fit to pass.

The question of the recognition of belligerency or independence should be determined upon a full view of the entire situation. Every fact bearing upon it ought to be before that department charged with the responsibility of acting. It is manifest that the most important documents, the most direct and convincing circumstances, may be contained in official communications containing matter which ought not to be made public. Indeed, it is safe to say that the most important information is doubtless encountered in such documents. The very gravity of the disclosures therein contained makes it inadvisable to surrender them. So that we who claim the right to pass upon this issue must concede that all avenues of information are not open to us—many are open to us, no doubt, but all are not open to us—and that the most material part of the case is withheld in harmony with the Constitution, which, it is claimed, gives us the power to overrule the Executive, notwithstanding his superior facilities for knowing the facts, and his power to withhold information officially received by him, and which appears to him (perhaps correctly) properly determinative of the entire matter. If it be true that the Constitution has made it our duty to pass upon the diplomatic questions involved and has given to the President means of obtaining information not granted to any other department, and has likewise left the disclosure of such knowledge wholly discretionary with him, the system is radically defective. It is not likely that the President requires more data than the Senate or the Congress, and to require us to act without all the evidence is to compel a judgment in the absence of the most material evidence.

I have already referred to the opinion of Mr. Monroe on this subject regarding Executive power. I wish to attract attention to the circumstance that Mr. Monroe deemed it advisable to send commissioners to the South American states for the purpose of enabling him to determine whether he should recognize the independence of the new governments. These commissioners he, as Chief Executive, sent to the South American republics that he might obtain information to justify him in reaching a conclusion as to whether he ought to accord a declaration of independence or not. In many instances subsequent Administrations found it desirable to send emissaries abroad for the purpose of determining similar issues without consulting Congress.

Agents or messengers have been sent not as diplomats or ministers, and therefore without consultation with the Senate, the branch of Congress solely authorized to confirm envoys and plenipotentiaries; but these appointments have been justified, not only in many of the cases cited but in many others, because of the fact that they were the mere agents of the Executive, his messengers sent abroad to bring him word as to affairs concerning which he needed information in order to duly execute a constitutional power, to wit, the recognition of a new government.

The case of Mr. Trist, who was sent as a confidential agent to Mexico (and the object and purpose of his mission appears, 2 Wharton on International Law, section 154), is an exemplification of the authority of the President in this regard. The appointment of Archbishop Hughes and Bishop McIlraine, Mr. Everett, Mr. Winthrop, and Mr. J. B. Kennedy as confidential agents with reference to matters connected with the recognition of belligerency during our domestic strife contributes an interesting chapter to the exercise of authority by the President without consulting the Senate and all within the recognized diplomatic limits.

The case often referred to here—so frequently that it is not necessary for me to discuss it—of Mr. Mann and the Hungarian controversy is in point. Mr. Webster's elaborate presentation of the subject and the treatment it received at the hands of Mr. Everett are all in the same line. I will not go over them, for they have been dwelt upon often and are familiar to the Senate and to the country.

When we speak of the advisability of reposing power in one department of the Government in preference to another, our argument is only of value in so far as it tends to illustrate the motives and objects and ends sought to be accomplished by the framers of the Constitution, and in an ambiguous case, if it is found that the lodgment of power in one particular department would be manifestly inadvisable, and if the language is obscure or the construction in doubt, perhaps we may be aided to some extent when we consider it on principle and in the light of the practical interpretation of experience.

THE NECESSITY OF SECRECY IN DIPLOMATIC AFFAIRS.

It is notorious that it is practically impossible to preserve secrecy as to matters occurring in the Senate. It frequently happens that debates taking place in supposed executive session are publicly reported; and while it is usually true that the reports made and the deductions drawn are not altogether correct, and there are many omissions of vital and essential features, yet it is also a well-known fact that whenever a sensational proposition or anything calculated to excite public curiosity or interest is announced in executive session it finds its way to the public. The delicacy of foreign negotiations, the ease with which controversies nearly settled may be impeded by ill-advised expressions or premature disclosure, is too plain to need comment.

Nor is this all. We know that the Senate is not now and never has been and never can be as reliable a place for the carrying on of those negotiations which are frequently necessary in the management of international disputes, and the same may be said with more emphasis with reference to Congress. Thus, within a year perhaps, we have heard remarks made with reference to foreign governments with which we were at peace. We have heard a friendly nation called "a toothless wolf," "a Gila monster," "a nation whose symbol of power is a monkey and an organ grinder," and kindred phrases in a body several of whose members now claim almost exclusive diplomatic authority. Our ability to excite a foreign government, our ability to involve the Government of the United States in difficulty, certainly will not be seriously challenged. We are not as successful in procuring the spreading of the wings of peace over the earth. Mr. Sanguily may well doubt the propriety of our interference with his case, which is now being energetically pressed by our State Department.

While intemperate remarks are delivered here, persons in whom we have an interest are being tried and sentenced for violations of municipal law, and our State Department is endeavoring to extricate, by diplomacy, many in whom we are concerned who have, by reason of their desire to liberate another people, placed themselves within the reach of the criminal processes of a friendly power. It is believed that utterances made upon this floor, which could not have any effect for good, have made it more difficult for the Executive to procure liberation of individuals in Cuba who have been in the greatest peril.

The Constitution conferred upon the Senate and the House jurisdiction as to treaties, and also in the matter of certain appointments, and that it was the part of wisdom so to do is, I believe, obvious. Whether we consider a treaty as a contract, in accordance with the views of Mr. Frelinghuysen and others, or whether we regard it as in the nature of legislation (and the Constitution declares a treaty to be the supreme law of the land), it is proper for the lawmaking power to be consulted as to subjects which not only affect foreign relations but often directly interfere with the acts of Congress and the exercise of municipal powers by the several States. In the making of a contract the ability and character of the Senate has always been of great assistance, and I doubt whether there has ever been a topic of international concern submitted in the form of a treaty where much light and many wise suggestions have not emanated from this body. Legislation can not be conducted by the Executive alone, and upon the same principle it may be said that no treaty ought to be made without the cooperation of the Senate, and the framers of the Constitution, in making it impossible to perfect such an instrument in the absence of two-thirds ratification here, undoubtedly considered that such a strong indorsement would atone for the absence of the other branch of Congress. Were the concurrence of the House necessary, there would be much friction, many misunderstandings, and numerous contentions with nations with whom we had been previously on terms of amity. But the justification of the policy to be met with in the matter of ratifying treaties is found in the fact that we there deal not only with foreign governments regarding purely international matters, but with propositions affecting legislation, and which must, as I have already remarked, have more or less effect upon the domestic concerns of the several States.

The difficulties unavoidable in treating diplomatic questions in the Senate must be evident to all. Not only are imprudent remarks indulged in because of impulses natural to momentary excitement, induced occasionally by ill-founded newspaper utterances, mistaken reports—the result of journalistic enterprise and competition—but Senators are in the habit of giving their opinions through resolutions of various kinds, often accompanied by speeches exceedingly demonstrative and very seldom involving the actual opinion of a majority of the Chamber or even of a committee.

Such resolutions, after being discussed at the time of their presentation, are sent to committee and are perhaps never reported back, or if reported are in a modified form; and when the matter is investigated it is perhaps discovered that the circumstances are not such as to warrant the belligerent remarks which had been made at the time of introduction.

When Mr. Cleveland sent in his Venezuelan message there was considerable excitement. Senators for the first time during my brief incumbency here expressed their appreciation by applause upon the floor. A bill was speedily passed placing the necessary funds in the hands of the Executive to enable him to proceed with the work outlined in the message. Resolutions of varied form were introduced, and finally the Committee on Foreign Relations, through the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] who sits near me, presented a concurrent resolution of considerable length, purporting to define the Monroe doctrine and to extend its application much beyond the lines laid down by Mr. Cleveland.

Afterwards the same distinguished Senator delivered an address in support of his report. He took very advanced ground. The resolution is still upon our Calendar, and no vote will ever be had upon it. I intend to refer to several other reports of the Committee on Foreign Relations preceding the remarkable Sanguily resolution now before us, and shall endeavor to show that the Secretary of State has done his duty under the law ably and effectively. But I will now yield to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON], and if the appropriation bills are again displaced I will continue my argument. At all events, I will not, under prevailing circumstances, proceed further at this late hour.

GEORGE WASHINGTON AGUIRRE.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very thankful to the Senator from California for his courtesy. He has the floor on the joint resolution which is before the Senate, and it can be disposed of if Senators will only contain themselves a little while in a legitimate and in a decent way. I rose under the privilege which was accorded to me by the Senator from California to ask unanimous consent for the adoption of a resolution which I will read:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if it is not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate such information as has been furnished to or obtained by the Executive or the Department of State relating to the arrest and imprisonment of and any proceedings against George Washington Aguirre, a youth of 19 years of age, and a citizen of the United States, who, to obtain the benefit of a general amnesty proclaimed by the Captain-General of Cuba, surrendered to the Spanish authorities in Cuba on the 4th day of July, 1896.

You will observe, Mr. President, that there is quite an association of dates there that have a great hold upon the affections of the American people. He seems to have surrendered on the 4th day of July, 1896, and his name his George Washington Aguirre. He is 19 years of age, and he surrendered under a proclamation of amnesty which invited him to come in and surrender. Doubtless he is one of our American boys, of Cuban origin, who has gone down there to take a hand in that scrimmage, as I am afraid a good many of them are inclined to do. For the benefit of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], if he doubts the citizenship of this man (he seems to turn his head in this way as if he wanted to make a point of citizenship, as he made yesterday), I will call his attention to another name by reading the following letter:

NEW YORK CITY, February 24, 1897.

MY DEAR SIR: I desire to call your attention to the case of George Washington Aguirre, an American citizen, 19 years of age, and a prisoner in the Cubana fortress in Habana since the 4th day of July last. He surrendered under the amnesty proclamation of General Weyler promising freedom to those who gave themselves up. He was promptly ordered to be court-martialed, but by the interference of General Lee this was changed to an order for a civil trial. This civil trial has not come yet and likely never will, without the aid of our Government. The tortures of this boy threaten his life. I make this statement to you upon respectable authority, who have requested this letter. I have no personal knowledge of the facts. The authority of this nation should correct such wrongs, and speedily. His release should be demanded at once.

I am, very truly, yours,

ETHAN ALLEN.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN.

Now, there is another name connected historically with the United States, and I suppose I can venture to assume here in presenting this resolution that this boy, whose name is George Washington Aguirre, and who is only 19 years of age, is a citizen of the United States, because Ethan Allen has said so. That is as far as I can go upon it. Now, acting upon that predicate, I want to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the adoption of this resolution for information from the President.

Mr. HOAR. What was it the Senator called my attention to? I came into the Chamber as he finished the reading.

Mr. MORGAN. I called attention to the fact that this man was evidently of Cuban birth, born of a Cuban family, because his name is Aguirre. I supposed the Senator would be ready to raise the question of naturalization on him, and I wanted to say that I had no further testimony to offer on the subject than the testimony of Ethan Allen.

Mr. HOAR. The Ethan Allen of the Revolution?

Mr. MORGAN. His grandson.

Mr. PLATT. He is president of the Cuban junta of New York.

Mr. MORGAN. He is a grandson of Ethan Allen of the Revolution and is very apt to be president of a revolutionary junta, or whatever you may call it.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator said something about the case that was up yesterday as I came in.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I was going to get to that after a little. I ask for the adoption of the resolution, Mr. President.

Mr. FRYE. It is only a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. WHITE. If there be no objection and no discussion, I will yield for that purpose only. I wish to make a very limited number of observations, which will not consume five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course one objection will carry it over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read at the desk for information.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if it is not in his opinion incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate such information as has been furnished to or obtained by the Executive or the Department of State relating to the arrest and imprisonment of and any proceedings against George Washington Aguirre, a youth of 19 years of age, and a citizen of the United States, who, to obtain the benefit of a general amnesty proclaimed by the Captain-General of Cuba, surrendered to the Spanish authorities in Cuba on the 4th day of July, 1896.

Mr. HOAR. It alleges certain facts.

Mr. GRAY. I rise to say a word and to ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield for the purpose?

Mr. WHITE. I can not yield for a debate.

Mr. GRAY. It is not debate. I want to ask a question.

Mr. WHITE. I will yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I want to appeal to the Senator from Alabama that he allow the resolution to be so amended as not to make the Senate of the United States responsible for allegation of fact of which they can know nothing. It may be all true, but if he will put in the word "alleged" before "citizen" and "alleged" before "surrendered," I have no objection to the resolution. Otherwise I have.

Mr. MORGAN. I will do that with great cheerfulness, because the Senate of the United States has got so far that it is not willing to take any responsibility for——

Mr. LINDSAY and Mr. WHITE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be amended accordingly. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WHITE. For a question.

Mr. LINDSAY. I desire to know whether this able-bodied young man, who abandoned the Cuban cause and took advantage of the amnesty proclamation, ought not to change his name before he asks the Senate of the United States to intervene in his behalf. That was a very un-George Washington like act, and I do not think he comes here in a position to demand any extraordinary consideration at the hands of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. How could he change his name?

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. LINDSAY. I refer to the George Washington part of his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WHITE. I do not want to discriminate, and therefore I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I happen to know this young man, George Washington Aguirre. He is a native American, born of Cuban parents, who became naturalized and lived in this country and abroad. He is a young man, animated by a noble, virtuous, honorable sentiment of devotion to the country of his forefathers. He went to Cuba for the purpose of rendering patriotic aid to the cause which he believed in common with all the Cuban people to be a true and honorable effort to obtain independence. He is quite a youth, not yet being 21 years of age. He was here in Washington just before his departure for Cuba. I have no doubt from these facts, which are within my knowledge, that the statements of the letter read by the Senator from Alabama are true.

Mr. LINDSAY. He did not desert the Cuban cause?

Mr. CALL. I suppose that, like many others, he might have been exhausted by the severe privations, to which he was unaccustomed. I know nothing about that; but a youth, comparatively of tender years, and not accustomed to great exposure, might quite naturally be unable to continue in the service.

Mr. WHITE. As I understand, the resolution in its present form is objected to, and therefore I presume it will go over.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Alabama accepted the amendment proposed.

Mr. WHITE. Then, if it may be voted upon without further discussion, I will yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama accepted the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. Let us hear the amended resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read as amended.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate such information as has been furnished to or obtained by the Executive of the Department of State relating to the arrest and imprisonment of and any proceedings against George Washington Aguirre, a youth of 19 years of age, and an alleged citizen of the United States, who, to obtain the benefit of a general amnesty proclaimed by the Captain-General of Cuba, surrendered to the Spanish authorities in Cuba on the 4th day of July, 1896.

Mr. GRAY. Let it read "is alleged to have surrendered." We do not know anything about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. ALLEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If this resolution is passed, does it displace the Sanguily resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not, the Chair will state.

Mr. BERRY and Mr. MILLS. Question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the resolution. Is the Senate ready for the question? The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Alabama as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I trust that we will find George Washington Aguirre to be a duly qualified citizen of some country. I am not altogether convinced of his innocence, of his impeccability, or his statesmanship. I do not consider these propositions established merely because he bears the name of George Washington. I remember some time ago prosecuting a person, who was sent to the penitentiary of my State, whose name was Juan de Dios (John of God). He never by word or deed justified a claim of honesty.

I do not intend to discuss questions relating to Julio Sanguily at any length to-day for the reasons stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I understand that a resolution will be offered later by Mr. Sanguily's friends in this Chamber protesting against his pardon. They seem to be disturbed because he is at liberty.

Objections have already been registered to the action of Sanguily and his counsel in admitting guilt and seeking pardon. It is unfortunate that we have not been able to control Mr. Sanguily in this respect, and his absence from prison will deprive the world of a vast amount of very effective and charming eloquence, accompanied, no doubt, by applause of an intelligent and discriminating character. It is indeed too bad that Sanguily has been pardoned, even though our resolution has not passed and has not been transmitted to the Government of Spain. It is to be hoped, Mr. President, that when the Committee on Foreign Relations brings us a case for discussion hereafter it will be a live case, and it is to be hoped when a resolution is produced here demanding somebody's surrender that we may not discover in the midst of patriotic declamation that the gentleman whose liberty we are seeking to obtain has already successfully petitioned for a pardon and admitted his guilt without consulting us. We can hardly retrieve our position by substituting George Washington Aguirre for Don Julio Sanguily. [Laughter.]

I regret that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is not in this Chamber. Possibly he may have heard of the pardon of Don Julio Sanguily. Were the chairman of the committee here, I should ask him whether it is true that he had in his pocket, or that his committee had in its custody yesterday, when this question was being considered, a document showing that Mr. Sanguily had petitioned for pardon. Such an assertion has been made, but I should like to know whether it is true. I have no information upon the subject. If the report be true, the Committee on Foreign Relations should not have kept the information from the Senate. If it was not proper information to be given publicly, we might have placed ourselves "in comunicado," and should have closed the doors; in that way we might perhaps have constituted ourselves a body of "pacificos."

I do not wish to interfere with the appropriation bills which were set aside to-day in order that Don Julio Sanguily might be released. I will yield to the Senator from South Dakota to make the motion of which he has already given notice.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations before that motion is put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORGAN. I have asked unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator can say what he pleases after the appropriation bill has been taken up. Nobody can prevent it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I insist on my motion. The matter can be debated after the Indian appropriation bill is taken up.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. FRYE. The Senator can speak after the bill has been taken up.

Mr. PETTIGREW. After the bill is up, Senators may talk as much as they please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Dakota that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10002) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I propose to discuss the Indian appropriation bill, and not the Cuban question. In a very few words I desire to reply to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE].

In the first place, in regard to the point of order he has made as to this legislation, I do not wish to detain the Senate except to say that almost the entire legislation which has been had with reference to the Indian country has been legislation on appropriation bills. The Dawes Commission was created by an appropriation bill; the sale of the Cherokee strip lands was by an appropriation bill, and the Dawes Commission was continued at the last session of Congress on an appropriation bill.

These questions of order have invariably been decided by the Senate according as to what its judgment was on the merits of the question. There can be no objection to this legislation on an appropriation bill which would not apply on any other bill. All I ask of the Chair is that he follow the almost universal rule which has been followed by presiding officers in the past, and that this question be submitted to a vote of the Senate to determine whether or not it is in order, and let the Senate determine it.

In regard to the other point made by the Senator from Tennessee, I want to say that, upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], the part of the bill to which the Senator from Tennessee so much objects, and to which a large part of his speech was confined, has already been stricken from the bill, and is not now before the Senate.

Mr. BATE. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not refer to that part of the bill at all.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Tennessee alluded at length to the allotment of lands, and to the railroad company, which, he said, was entitled to receive a large number of acres of land.

Mr. BATE. I hope the Senator will do me the justice to say that my speech was in reply to the Senator from Missouri, who discussed that point.

Mr. BERRY. That is not in the bill; it has been stricken from the bill.

I wish to say, furthermore, that there was nothing in that amendment which would have given the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad, or any other railroad, one foot of land in that Territory under any condition. The amendment was specifically framed to prevent their getting anything under it. Therefore, if that had remained, the criticism of the Senator from Tennessee would still be wholly without foundation; but that is out of the bill.

In regard to the legislation as to the Dawes Commission, I want to state that I believe now that the authorities of those tribes in that Territory are disposed to make conditions and treat with the Dawes Commission. I want to say that until within the last year, however, some of those nations did not intend to treat, and showed no disposition to treat. That is not true of all of the tribes, but it is true as to some of them. But I want to be entirely fair and just to those people, and I will say now that I believe the men who represent them here have come to the conclusion and know that the condition which exists there can not be continued, and that the time has come when other arrangements must be made, and I believe they will be made.

That which is left in the bill is in regard to the condition of the courts in that country. I state now that the men in that Territory, the Indian citizens there, know and believe, and are as anxious as anyone else, that the present jurisdiction should be taken away from the Indian courts and conferred upon the courts of the United States. It has been notorious, it is not denied, that those Indian courts have been absolutely as corrupt and unreliable as it is possible for human beings to be. I do not say that every man connected with them is corrupt, but I claim that corruption prevails to an alarming extent in those courts; and it is not denied by the representatives of those tribes.

Every intelligent man who has gone there and who knows anything of the condition there has come to the conclusion that some change is absolutely necessary. Five or six years ago the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and the then Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Dawes, believed very much as the Senator from Tennessee now believes, but there is not one of them who went into that section from any part of this country, I care not whether he lived in New England or any other part of the North or in the South, who has made himself familiar with the conditions there, who does not know that there is an absolute obligation on this Government to see that matters shall not continue as they have in the past. There have been robberies outrageous, mostly by white men, I will say, who have taken refuge in that nation. They robbed a bank within my own town in broad daylight, living, as I do, upon the border. The robbery was committed by ten men who came out of the Territory and shot down one of our citizens on the street.

All the provision of the bill which is material is that the jurisdiction of those courts shall be taken from them, and that criminals shall be tried the same as the white men who are now in the Territory. The United States court has already jurisdiction of controversies where one of the parties is a white man and the other is an Indian. The proposition of this amendment is to extend that jurisdiction to all parties, and to place Indians upon precisely the same plane as the white men, giving them the same rights—giving them the right to sit upon a jury and to take their chances among the whites.

The Senator from Tennessee insinuates that there is something in the amendment which would violate the rights of those Indians. I think if a vote was taken in those Territories—and I know there are men now in this city connected with those Territories who so believe—it would result largely in favor of this legislation, so far as the courts are concerned.

With regard to the treaty with the Dawes Commission, that provision has been stricken out. As I said before, if this provision is retained in regard to the courts, I have no doubt but what within six months or a year treaties will be made in regard to allotments and all the rights of the Indians will be protected; but if this legislation be defeated, the Senator will find that there will be no agreements of any kind with the Dawes Commission. If the Senate desire a suitable settlement of this matter, to which both sides agree, it will keep this provision in the bill in regard to the abolition of the Indian courts.

Those courts, as everybody in that section and as every committee which has visited there knows, are incapable of rendering justice between their own citizens and are bringing scandal upon each of those nations. If this provision is retained, I believe the men who have heretofore resisted the Dawes Commission, who have refused to make any agreement, within less than twelve months will consent to a peaceable adjustment. I desire to say now that I believe they are in earnest, and the only thing which could put us back for five years and force us to go over this again is to defeat this provision. If we do so, they will go back to their people, and this fight will have to be made over again. They will say that there is no danger, and then the fight goes on, as it has gone on for the last four years. If we want to settle the matter peaceably, we may settle it in this way, which is favored by every man who comes from that section in both Houses of Congress, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican. Every Senator who has visited there, and every delegation from the House of Representatives that has been there, and everyone who lives in that locality knows that this is the best way to do it. It is best for the Indians and best for the 300,000 white men there. It is only Senators and others who do not live there and who are not familiar with the facts who make this fight and these objections to the settlement of this question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I had no intention of saying a word on this resolution, which I think was properly laid aside and the appropriation bill taken up. But, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. SHERMAN], the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] saw fit to attack that committee and revive the debate, and say one or two things which I do not propose to leave unanswered, as the chairman of the committee is not present to say anything in regard to it.

I am very sorry that the Senator from California should be so disturbed about the flow of eloquence in the Senate on the Sanguily resolution, and about the applause in the galleries. I think he was unreasonably disturbed. He spoke for four hours himself, and no galleries interrupted him. [Laughter.] Also, Mr. President, I want to say that this matter is not to be settled by sneers, nor is an answer made in this case by mispronouncing the name "Julio," nor is this case answered by making fun of some man whose name happens to be that of the great general and statesman whose birthday we celebrated here a few days ago. This matter can not be disposed of by sneers.

The case in which a pardon has just been granted is but one case. There is information which has been withheld from the Senate and from the American people in a great many other cases not in relation to Cubans, but in relation to American citizens. Those will all come to the surface. We shall all see it some day; the Senate will have the opportunity of seeing it; the American people will have the opportunity of seeing it.

As to this specific case and the charge made against the Foreign Relations Committee, I desire simply to say a single word. That committee had received no information that this man had been pardoned. The Committee on Foreign Relations began to consider this case about one month ago. The report they made is dated the 1st day of February. We put the matter over from week to week at the request of the State Department, because we were told that the diplomatic negotiations which had been going on for about twenty-three months were about approaching a close, and the Department hoped in a few days to have this man pardoned. We put it over; and finally we reported the resolution, and we got the man's pardon the next morning. In other words, twenty-three months were consumed in diplomatic negotiations; but after the matter was taken up and it was discussed by the committee and presented at the bar of American public opinion, the news of the man's pardon came by cable this morning, and we are sneered at because we are told he was going to be pardoned any way.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question as to a matter of fact?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts says that twenty-three months have been consumed by the State Department in negotiations in regard to the case of Sanguily.

Mr. LODGE. I think I have stated the fact correctly.

Mr. GRAY. Is it not a fact that the larger part of those negotiations, and the greater part of the time occupied in pursuing them, was consumed in discussing the treaty between the United States and Spain in regard to citizens of the United States who were arrested for participating in rebellion, without arms in their hands, and demanding for them a trial by a civil court under the treaty; and whether, at last, those negotiations were not successful in procuring that trial, and that the necessary delay was by reason of the procedure of the courts, which, of course, takes time?

Mr. LODGE. I did not enter into what the diplomatic negotiations were about.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts gave that impression; at least, I so understood him.

Mr. LODGE. I stated that diplomatic negotiations had been going on in regard to this man's case for twenty-three months, and that is absolutely true.

Mr. GRAY. But the Senator gave the impression that futile negotiations were going on for twenty-three months, whereas at different stages the demands made by the State Department were acceded to by the Government of Spain, and the trial demanded before a civil court for Sanguily was granted after necessary delay owing to their form of procedure.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say the negotiations were futile. That word was not used by me, but used by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I say that is the impression I got from what the Senator stated.

Mr. LODGE. I did not so state, but I shall not quarrel with the Senator about that. All I said was that for twenty-three months diplomatic negotiations had been going on in regard to this man; that the question has been considered in the committee for one month; that the resolution was reported to the Senate yesterday, and this morning we have cable news that Sanguily is pardoned. Those are the simple facts, and I am perfectly willing to leave them.

Mr. GRAY. Those are not the simple facts.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. Had not diplomatic negotiations been going on for twenty-three months?

Mr. GRAY. There it is again, Mr. President. The simple statement is made that negotiations of a diplomatic character have been going on for twenty-three months, and the impression is made—I do not know whether it is sought to be made by the Senator from Massachusetts or not—that negotiations, which were futile in their character, have been going on all that time in regard to the release of Sanguily, whereas a greater part of the time was occupied in demanding the rights of Sanguily under the treaty with Spain.

Mr. CHANDLER. Where was Sanguily all the time?

Mr. LODGE. I did not say that the negotiations were futile. The Senator from Delaware keeps saying that.

Mr. GRAY. I intended that the Senator should state or that I should state for him what the real facts were.

Mr. LODGE. I omitted no facts. I say diplomatic negotiations were going on for twenty-three months, and during that time this man was in prison. There is no question about it. I do not say the negotiations have not been successful. We know they have been successful, because he was released this morning or yesterday.

I say it was twenty-three months that the State Department was engaged in negotiations before the Senate did anything, so that they did not seem unreasonably impatient about it.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to state that this man was tried and condemned on December 3, 1895, and sentenced on December 3, 1895, more than a year ago.

Mr. LODGE. He was sentenced more than a year ago, Mr. President.

Mr. GRAY. The trial from which the appeal was made was had on the 3d of December, 1896. That was the trial against which the State Department protested.

Mr. LODGE. He has been tried, and an appeal has been taken, and all that. But, Mr. President, I do not care to go into the details of it. The facts are perfectly well known.

I only desire to say, in reply to what the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] has said, that the Committee on Foreign Relations had put this matter over two or three times at the request of the Secretary of State, because Sanguily was about to be released and action was about to be taken as the result of diplomatic negotiations. We had no information yesterday that he was pardoned, so far as I am aware.

Mr. MORGAN. We have none now.

Mr. LODGE. We had no information that he had been pardoned.

Mr. WHITE. Nobody said you had.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator from California—if I misunderstood him, I am very sorry—to say that the committee yesterday had information that Sanguily had been pardoned.

Mr. WHITE. I stated that the committee, as I understood it, had the information in their pockets, or the chairman had in his pocket a petition filed by this gentleman's counsel and himself, asking for pardon, and that they knew of the processes which had been had in connection with the affair.

Mr. LODGE. What counsel does the Senator refer to?

Mr. WHITE. The counsel, if I may be permitted to pronounce his name—although I have heretofore supposed that I had a little knowledge of the Spanish language—I may be permitted to say Julio Sanguily, notwithstanding a correction by the infallible authority at present upon the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is welcome to pronounce that name any way he likes. I thought from his knowledge of Spanish that he was mispronouncing the name humorously, as that is the common form that is employed against Cubans.

All I want to know is who the counsel is who has made this statement. I received no information and the committee recejved none.

Mr. WHITE. I had no reference to the Senator, and was not thinking of him in connection with the matter.

Mr. LODGE. I can only answer for the committee. The committee received no statement. There was a dispatch read here by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] from Mr. Dominiguez, I think, who said an appeal had been taken. That was read here in open Senate by the Senator from Maine. But there was nothing sent to the committee except a single communication from the State Department, and not from the counsel. That did not say that the pardon had been granted. It said what had been said before, that efforts were being made to obtain a pardon.

Mr. GRAY. Let me ask the Senator whether the information he got in committee—as long as he has spoken of what occurred in the committee—was not to the effect that a pardon had been determined upon just as soon as the condition precedent, which is requisite under Spanish law, had been complied with?

Mr. LODGE. I understood that they were trying to get a pardon.

Mr. GRAY. I tried to get out the information that it had been determined upon by the Spanish executive.

Mr. LODGE. Then the Senator said that a pardon had been granted.

Mr. GRAY. That it had been determined to be granted as soon as the condition precedent, necessary under under Spanish law, had been complied with.

Mr. LODGE. That is exactly what I said. I said that we received information that a pardon was shortly expected.

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. And that it had not been granted.

Mr. GRAY. Your previous statement was, unless I misunderstood you—of course I have no altercation, and will have no altercation, with the Senator—that the information was merely that efforts were being made to obtain a pardon.

Mr. LODGE. No; I mean that the process was going on for twenty-three months, or any period you please.

Mr. GRAY. You said it was approaching a conclusion.

Mr. LODGE. That was what we were told at the beginning of February, when we took the matter up—that it was approaching a conclusion. As the Senator well knows, we postponed the matter from week to week on that account.

I did not mean to be drawn into this discussion. What I desired to say was that the committee did not have the information which the Senator from California attributed to it. I know nothing about the counsel except from the dispatch read by the Senator from Maine. I did not then know that the Mr. Dominguez who is named in the dispatch was the counsel for Sanguily.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think the Senators of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] might let some other Senators have an opportunity of saying something upon questions of importance which come before this body.

On yesterday the Senator from California, professing great interest in the passage of the appropriation bills, spent the whole day in discussing a question which had no practical connection with the business of this Senate—a mere question of his opinion that this Government was an absolute Government, that the executive power was paramount and supreme over the legislative department of this Government—a contention, Mr. President, which is answered in every word and in every line of the Constitution of this country, a government of the people, with the legislative power supreme.

But I have been solicitous, having introduced the resolution, to have an opportunity of saying something upon it and have not until this moment had an opportunity, when, upon the pending appropriation bill, having been the author of this resolution and the author of the resolution for the recognition of the independence of Cuba, I am compelled to say a word in vindication of these resolutions.

Mr. President, the resolution for demanding on the part of this Government the release of Sanguily was not in the interest of Mr. Sanguily, it was not in the interest of any private individual, it was for the honor and the dignity of this American country; and it would seem to me that it would have touched and inspired the bosom of every man who had any instinct of patriotism, and pride in the honor and in the glory of our flag and our institutions—the degrading comparison between our country and England, that a man who had thrown around him the prestige of American citizenship, be it right or be it wrong, by the authority of our Government, in chains and perpetual imprisonment, tried by a mockery of justice, not upon evidence that was ever communicated, but upon alleged facts held in the bosom of the Captain-General, and which upon the trial was decided that inasmuch as he was an officer of high dignity and importance, his opinion of this confidential information should be held binding upon the court and its judges; under a pretense of that kind this American citzen was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in chains. And yet we find advocates upon this floor defending, and seeking to continue this indignity to the Government and the people of the United States, and interposing objections and arguments upon subjects that have no relation to it.

Mr. President, what has the Senate before it that it should permit this delay, not in the examination of Sanguily's right, but on the question of whether or not treaties of the United States with Spain, demanding on the part of that Government certain rights to American citizens, should be respected and regarded?

Here we have the report in the case of Lopez from the State Department, murdered, as stated by our own authorities. Here we have the case of Govin, butchered, miserably butchered, reported by our own authorities. We have the case of the citizens of the United States taken on board the Competitor—sailors, humble men, having no part in the contracts or charters by which that vessel was bound to go to certain ports—held to-day in confinement and under sentence of trial by court-martial. Protest after protest on the part of the consular authorities and the representatives of this Government has been filed. What do we have now as a sequel of the action of the Senator from California and others here who have prevented the assertion on the part of the United States of its intention to protect American citizens?

Mr. President, I read from the New York Journal one of the latest reports, a report which we understand is sanctioned by the consul-general of the United States, who has sent in his resignation because he is unable to protect American citizens of the United States by the authority of this Government. Let us read:

DR. RUIZ'S DYING MESSAGE TO HIS WIFE AND CHILDREN.

To Mercedes, Evangeline, Ricardito, Rene, and Gloria:

Farewell, children of my life. Be obedient to your mother. I bless you all. I shall be killed.

To Rita, my wife, my soul, adios. If I am removed, tell all.

RICARDO.

This is an article by George Eugene Bryson. I know George Eugene Bryson. He is a young man who grew up in my State. I have known him all his life. He is of respectable family, and he is a man of character. He has been the correspondent of one of the great New York journals in the South American countries, and recently for the last few years in the Island of Cuba. What does he say:

Dr. Ruiz, tortured, dying in his cell—

Ah! that does not move these advocates of the Government of Spain's continued persecution of our people.

Dr. Ruiz—

An American citizen—

Dr. Ruiz, tortured, dying in his cell under the brutality of his Spanish jailers, found a means to leave a record that proves his murder and makes the story of his suicide a plain lie.

As soon as the facts of his arrest became known, his wife tried to send him in some things to make his prison life endurable. He was "incommunicado." She could not see him or exchange a word with him.

KEPT THE WIFE OUT.

They would not even allow her to send him his meals, and she had to take back the cot she brought to the prison door.

Of course, Spain gives her prisoners neither bed nor bench to lie on. Not even a mattress or a bundle of rags tempers the hardness of the foul floor on which a prisoner must sleep.

Knowing all this, the wife of the unfortunate dentist was importunate in her plea to be allowed to send her husband something. At last she wore the jailers out, and they permitted her to send to her husband an old steamer chair.

MESSAGE ON A CHAIR.

And it is this chair that after his death proves the case against his murderers, and will, if there is left the least spark of patriotism in the breasts of the men at the head of the Government at Washington, avenge Dr. Ruiz's death.

The widow yesterday brought this chair to the American consulate. It had been returned to her by the governor of the jail at Guanabacoa.

On the bottom of the chair, painfully scratched by the prisoner's finger nails, was this message:

DOOMED MAN'S BLESSING.

"To Mercedes, Evangeline, Ricardito, Rene, and Gloria:

"Farewell, children of my life. Be obedient to your mother. I bless you all. I shall be killed.

"To Rita, my wife, my soul, adios. If I am removed, tell all.

"RICARDO."

The message was scratched so deeply in the paint and varnish that even though the bottom of the chair is splashed with blood, the words are clearly legible.

It is typical of the stupidity of the Spanish jailors that they allowed the chair to go out uninspected.

Consul-General Lee will probably forward the chair to Washington with the documents in the case.

MORE INCRIMINATING EVIDENCE.

There is more evidence, though it comes indirectly through a horrified priest, who visited a prisoner in a cell adjoining that of Ruiz. This prisoner was afterwards executed.

The priest's story accounts for the puzzling marks found on the dead dentist's wrists by Dr. Burgess—

The American employee of the Marine-Hospital Service in Habana—at the autopsy. They were the marks left by the torture. They bound cords about his wrists and twisted them.

This is what caused the shrieks that came from poor Ruiz's cell.

From this and other evidence it is easy to piece out the whole awful story.

I will insert in the RECORD the remainder of this statement of fiendish cruelty that the people of the United States may understand how it is that here in this representative body no ear is found for the demand that the power of this Government shall be exerted for the protection of American citizens, and that these pretenses made here are unworthy of consideration.

FONDESVIELA'S FIENDISH WORK.

Arrested on the flimsiest evidence, Fondesviela tried in the usual way to torture out a confession. If the prisoner had yielded under the torment, he would have been shot to death for rebellion.

He would not yield, and they dared not free an American to tell of the tortures. From the moment they began to rack him his death was a certainty.

Ruiz realized this, and in the intervals between the rackings—these devils are ingenious enough to give a man a respite in which to think over what suffering he has still to go through—the prisoner scratched the message in the old chair on the chance that it would get back to his family and tell them of his fate.

RUIZ'S CASE NOT ISOLATED.

Ruiz is not the only man who has passed through torture to death in Cuba. To-day there are hundreds hoping that the death will not be long delayed.

Acting Captain-General Ahumada, in response to Consul-General Lee's energetic protest in the Ruiz case, promised to investigate the question, to probe it to the bottom and punish the guilty, but diplomatic promises will be the end of it unless Lee's demands be supported from Washington and backed up by the presence of American warships in Cuban waters.

RUIZ'S WIDOW THREATENED.

In fact, Fondesviela, the responsible, if not the actual assassin, remains in his post, has been recommended for new promotion, and only yesterday visited the Ruiz residence and by menaces and threats attempted to induce the widow to sign some papers with reference to her husband. The real purport of these papers was not fully explained.

Mrs. Ruiz came to this city afterwards to inform the consul-general, who, I understand, advised her to sign nothing, and afterwards sent a note to the palace, protesting against such molestations and insisting that she be protected from future impositions of a like nature.

Other Americans residing in Guanabacoa and Regla have come to the consul demanding protection, saying that open and repeated threats from Fondesviela's adjutants convince them their lives are in jeopardy.

Sanguily, held in prison for twenty-three months, upon evidence which is unworthy of being introduced or considered in any court, racked with wounds and disease, abandoned by the Government which had promised him protection, was compelled to confess. All systems of law discredit a confession taken from a prisoner under circumstances of cruelty. It is said here that he has confessed his guilt; but the record proves that he was not guilty and could not be guilty, and that his confession was extorted from him. But suppose he was guilty; what has that to do with the duty of the Government to protect from outrage and cruelty the citizens of the United States or those whom it has permitted to claim citizenship?

Mr. President, I introduced a year ago a joint resolution for the independence of the Island of Cuba. I introduced it again at the commencement of the present session. I have introduced resolution after resolution demanding that the Government of the United States shall protect its citizens and that it shall demand of Spain that this arbitrary imprisonment in violation of treaties shall cease; and here we have the conclusion of it; here we have a book of names of American citizens arrested in direct violation of the terms of the treaty between the United States and Spain, not one, but a hundred of them, and we are told by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations has evidence which is not accessible to the rest of us, that there are records still more startling which are held in the Department of State. It is time that the American people should know whether the statement in this paper that the citizens of the United States are petitioning the Queen and the Government of Great Britain for protection because they can not receive it from their own Government is true. It is time we should know whether or not the name "American citizen" has become a reproach in foreign lands, and whether in the Island of Cuba this terrible scene of fiendish butchery of women, of children, of young girls, whose bodies are found in a pit mutilated, shall continue; whether or not this Government has the power and has the duty impressed upon it sufficiently by this body to perform its plain duty of extending protection to American citizens unlawfully arrested and confined.

I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution now and have it passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, that all correspondence in the State Department relating to the alleged murder of Dr. Rentz, claimed to be an American citizen, at Guanabacoa, Cuba, by the authorities of Spain, be communicated to the Senate; and also that he inform the Senate of what efforts have been made, if any, to obtain information on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the resolution which has just been read may be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. WHITE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California objects, and the resolution will go over.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I do not wish to incommode the Senators who have charge of the appropriation bills, and I do not intend to do so, and I will say but a very few words.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] seems to think there has been a personal onslaught of some kind upon himself, and he was led to call my attention to the lack of enthusiasm created by my remarks made to the Senate yesterday. I presume his object in thus informing us was designed to excite my envy when contrasting my position with the enthusiastic demonstrations which ever attend his eloquent and relevant statements.

However, I have lived long enough to know that there are many great men in this world and that I have no claim to greatness, and it is enough for me even temporarily to rest in the shadow of the mighty intellectual power whose instruction has been so generously given. I, perhaps, might survive some of the comments of the Senator, but I do not know how I can exist in view of his criticism upon my pronunciation of the name of the party mentioned in the joint resolution. I ventured to call him Julio Sanguily, and the Senate has been informed that I mispronounced his name, and this I did in a disrespectful manner. If it were not for my faith in the abilities of the Senator from Massachusetts and my consequent belief that all of the Spanish scholars I have ever met have been mistaken as to the pronunciation of such names, I would, perhaps, hesitatingly venture to adhere to my own view. I will, however, study the lesson proffered by the Senator from Massachusetts and shall endeavor to absorb some of that learning which must be useful to the Senate, pertinent to this debate, and natural to the Senator from Massachusetts.

I regret that my friend the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] also accuses me of having taken up too much time. It is seldom that I take the floor save for an inquiry, whereas the Senator from Florida is a chronic speaker upon the subject of Cuba. He is not in a position to rebuke me for my single infraction. Now, that Julio Sanguily (I hope I may be permitted to continue to so pronounce his name) is free, we are treated to the case of Ruiz, and are told upon the authority of a newspaper, infallible, of course, before all tribunals, that Ruiz was badly treated, murdered in a dungeon. Comments on this topic are directed at me, and, as far as I am able to appreciate the Senator's meaning, the insinuation is conveyed that

I and other Senators who do not favor declaring war without ascertaining what we are to fight about are guilty of the murder of Ruiz, and this because Sanguily has been pardoned. This conclusion might be considered slightly illogical by some, but not by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator whether any motion has been made to substitute any other island for Cuba?

Mr. WHITE. I will say to the Senator from Maine that no motion has been made, but there are insinuations that something of the kind is coming; that if it be true that Sanguily has confessed his guilt, nevertheless there is suffering elsewhere, and it will be urged that while we were mistaken in the case of Sanguily, a valid cause of complaint must exist as to some one. There must be an oppressed innocent somewhere, and we will be fully informed regarding the outrage by illustrations in the newspapers and magnificent orations in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. But no motion has been made to substitute any other island for Cuba?

Mr. WHITE. Not yet.

Mr. GALLINGER. We are going to put in the State of Maine next instead of Cuba.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Florida, after commenting upon the immense amount of time that I took in discussing the Cuban question yesterday, in order to be truly consistent, proceeded to make a speech upon the subject himself.

I yielded to the appropriation bills, and I will do so again in the hope that these important measures may be passed, and that we may establish a field day for the discussion of Cuba, and give notice to all alleged suffering patriots, wherever found, that their cases will be taken up as soon as the Calendar will permit, and our Navy increased correspondingly to the necessities of our belligerency.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from California yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MORGAN. That bill is already before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Indian appropriation bill is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. It might seem peculiar that the remarks which I am endeavoring to answer were addressed to the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I understand that it is before the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. Have I the recognition of the Chair?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from California yielded to me.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to know whether I am recognized as entitled to the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine has been recognized in the time of the Senator from California.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought I was recognized. I am mistaken.

Mr. HALE. The Chair recognized me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to recognize the Senator from Alabama, but found that the Senator from California still retained the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I am mistaken, and I yield.

Mr. HALE. I simply desire to hold the Senate, so far as it can be done, to the consideration of the real business of the session. Everybody understands that if the appropriation bills are not considered and acted upon and passed—and there are only six days more in which to consider them—more or less of them will go over until the next session, and that the next session will be complicated with all subjects of legislation.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest to the Senator that there are but four days after to-day.

Mr. HALE. I was reckoning everything, including Sunday, because I have no doubt the Senate will be obliged to sit on Sunday.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That will make five.

Mr. HALE. There are in all only six days, including to-day and Sunday, and all I desire is that the Senate will confine itself to the consideration of the real business.

Mr. President, the moot court is over. The amazing display which was made here by the Committee on Foreign Relations in hurrying in an inflammatory joint resolution, couched in the most offensive form, in order to take up the time of the Senate, has passed. Nobody expects anything to come of it, and if the Senate will actually proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bills, which must be passed in order to prevent complications which will result next session, then there need be no question of doubt that the bills will receive consideration and actually be passed. But if the time is to be taken up by debating questions which are dead matter and which are ended, then Senators ought to understand and ought to realize that it will be impossible to pass the appropriation bills.

I do not propose to take any time upon this point. My motion was made not because it was needed formally, but in order to bring the body to the consideration of the actual business before it. All other matters ought to be left aside and out of consideration, as every hour will be needed from now until 12 o'clock on the 4th of March to pass the annual appropriation bills.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine ought to start out on a regular tour of lecturing, if he can find a lot of school children for his audience. On yesterday it was obvious and notorious that the Senator from Maine, being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, served notice upon the Senate that because the Senate chose to take up the Sanguily joint resolution, the joint resolution would not be permitted to pass. The RECORD shows it.

Mr. HALE. I said that it would not be permitted to pass without full debate.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, that is what it meant. We know what that meant. It meant a filibuster.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. HALE. After the Senator himself has consumed days and days upon the subject of Cuba, and Senators in sympathy with him have consumed days and days, until over 150 columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD have been taken up on that side and nothing has been said on the other side, it certainly is very extreme ground for him to take that if anybody wants to discuss the joint resolution it is filibustering. I deny it.

Mr. MORGAN. I yielded that far, and it is as far as I am going to yield. I do not expect to be interrupted any further.

The Senator from Maine, being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, charged with the duty of carrying the bills through, because the Senate of the United States, by a vote of 40 to 27, concluded to take up the joint resolution for discussion—I was prepared to vote upon it without offering a word of debate—notified the Senate that a filibuster would be organized which would carry the appropriation bills over beyond this session.

The Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] rose in his place and spoke three or four hours, during which time he did not touch the appropriation bills nor did he touch the Sanguily joint resolution. He spoke evidently for the purpose of giving utterance to some remarks which he had prepared upon constitutional law as affecting the power of the President of the United States and the power of Congress upon the recognition of foreign governments, and such as that. His speech was able enough, but entirely inappropriate to the occasion. So the Senator was merely occupying time, and doing it for the purpose of staving off any result upon the Sanguily case until something else could happen.

Now, we are informed that something else has happened. Who informs us? How do we get the information? Does the President of the United States inform this body that any change has taken place in the Julio Sanguily case? I have heard of no message from him. I have heard of no statement from the Secretary of State. We are informed now, as we were about the Ruiz case, through the newspapers as to the situation of this grave affair between the two powers—Spain and the United States of America. We are left here entirely in the dark, as far as the Executive is concerned, in respect to the attitude of this question.

I lament that the relations between the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States and the American people upon a question like this are so strained and are so dislocated that the Congress of the United States, in neither branch, can get information from him until it is pulled out of him by a sort of corkscrewing-resolution process in respect of any matter that concerns Cuban affairs.

I do not wonder that he wants to cover it up. I am not surprised that he prefers darkness rather than light in respect to these matters. I am not surprised that he shrinks from the examination of the American people whose hearts are aflame with a desire to see justice done to their citizens in Cuba. But so it is. We are confronted with that situation, and we are compelled to act without his guidance, his advice, his admonition, or his information.

Sir, the appropriation bill that is now before the Senate involves an inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes in this land, the people who are dependent upon us by an enforced citizenship which they never desired and very few of them have ever consented to accept, although we have tendered them land in payment for their acceptance. We are taking care of that class of our citizens. If one of those poor Indian citizens had happened to be in Cuba and had been treated as Sanguily has, I suppose there would be some appropriation put in this bill to provide for his family, to provide for his return to the United States, to provide for the protection of a man with an enforced allegiance; or if a negro were to go to Cuba, as some have gone from my own State, for the purpose of participating in this struggle on the side of Cuba, and one of those men should be treated as Sanguily has been treated, the Senate would be aflame with anxiety and determination to rescue that man from the jaws of Cuban cruelty and destruction; and I would be amongst the first of the men to vote for any sort of necessary provision for the purpose of extricating the man from that situation.

But here we are providing for the Indians. We have always provided for the negroes when we could. We have adopted citizens, who have come to us flying from persecutions and wrong and injustice. We have adopted citizens in this country, and all of that class are now informed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that hereafter when they are found in foreign parts they are to take with them a certificate of their naturalization which must show regularity on its face in every particular; otherwise the Government of the United States will be exonerated from its obligation to take care of them. I call the attention of this naturalized class in the United States to the attitude of the Senator from Massachusetts upon that question.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I decline to yield.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to state that that is absolutely a misstatement of my position.

Mr. MORGAN. I decline to yield. The record shows what your position was, and I am speaking from the record.

Mr. HOAR. I know; but it is different from what the Senator states.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not asking the Senator for any information about his position, because here is the record that shows what it was.

The point was made here yesterday that after the State of New York, through its judicial tribunals, had accepted the citizenship and allegiance, under oath, of Julio Sanguily, that record was liable to collateral attack in favor of Spain against the United States. That is the attitude. Senators get upon the floor, and for the purpose of justifying the imprisonment of Sanguily they take the ground here that he was justly condemned to a life in chains because they could imagine, out of the testimony in this case as they conceive it, that there had been some fraud in the naturalization of Sanguily.

If Sanguily had never been naturalized in this country, there is, Mr. President, an impulse of humanity that seems to be a welcome impulse, and very much at home in the Christian heart, which prompts, encourages, and sustains an honest Christian man in his demand that persecution under the name of the law and under the form of the law shall not be employed by any nation, at least one near to us, for the purpose of crushing out the life of a poor, old wounded, soldier, whose festering wounds, acquired twenty years ago, still disable him from hard labor and from the service of his family except in a precarious way.

Mr. HALE. What, Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. No; I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. MORGAN. I decline.

Mr. HALE. The Senate understands that this committee is the only committee that refuses to answer a question.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine can reply in his own time and in his own way. If he wants to argue the Cuban question on the appropriation bill, let him reply to me. That is all right.

Mr. HALE. Well——

Mr. MORGAN. But he can not take my time and interject his speech into mine. I decline, sir, to be interrupted by the gentlemen who are so anxious to discuss in my time upon the appropriation bill the Cuban question. Let them discuss it in their own time.

Mr. HALE. It is the only committee in the Senate——

Mr. MORGAN. I object to any interruption.

Mr. HALE. Which refuses to answer——

Mr. MORGAN. I call the Senator to order. I call him to order.

Mr. HALE. I say it is the only committee in the Senate that allows no questions to be asked.

Mr. MORGAN. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. MORGAN. I call him to order. He must not interrupt me, and I do not intend to submit to it. I notify the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. Here is a citizen of the United States, so stated in the last dispatch from General Lee. I will read that dispatch from General Lee, because he has that sort of humanity in his bosom that comes from a man who has courage and who has proved it in a life-long devotion to principle, even against the frowning, scoffing, persecuting spirit of the whole world. His name is a guaranty of honor, of courage, good sense, manhood, and American patriotism. See how he speaks about Julio Sanguily, whom the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] found it opportune to ridicule to-day, with his wounds, his bruises, his persecutions, his distresses, his compulsion under duress to permit his counsel to ask for a pardon. If the Senator from California, who has had full opportunity in his life to do so in a patriotic cause, had worn the scars that Sanguily wears, he might be pardoned, possibly, for scoffing at him now in his distress and his misfortune. Here is what Lee says about Sanguily, writing to Mr. Rockhill:

Yesterday noon I visited the Cabañas fort and had a talk with Mr. Julio Sanguily, an American citizen, and formerly a general in the insurgent army.

Lee had not found out that he was not an American citizen. He was proud to visit him in that character. He honored him because he found that his native land was so prone to that chronic cruelty which belongs as much to the Spanish character as it does to the Comanche Indian, and he found that Sanguily had the inspirations of an honest, patriotic heart beating in his bosom, and that after the failure of the revolution of 1868 to 1878 he had come to this free land and accepted our invitation to become a citizen of the United States, although he had been compelled by his poverty to return to his native land in order to rake together, with his wife and children, the little fragments of a confiscated estate, that he might live upon it, not being able because of his wounds to work at anything else. That glorious, grand man, Fitzhugh Lee, was proud to take him by the hand in a prison and call him an American citizen, while the Senator from Massachusetts repudiates him as such because he thinks there is a possibility that there was some fraud in his naturalization.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Alabama repudiates as such——

Mr. MORGAN. I object to an interruption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. HOAR. And doubts the name of——

Mr. MORGAN. Reply in your own time. I call the Senator to order; and that will not be a joke, either, if it is repeated. The Senator can amuse himself as much as he pleases by an interference with a gentleman on the floor in violation of the rules of the Senate, and shelter himself under the supposed dignity of his prestige and position here, but he can not do that with me.

Says Lee:

As you know, he was arrested in his house while taking a bath on the 24th day of February, 1895.

This letter was written January 6, 1897, and day before yesterday was the 24th of February, 1897, completing the full two years that that poor man had been confined in a Spanish dungeon for the mere purpose of exhibiting him to the world, and particularly to the Cuban people, as a desperate example of the rashness and inconsiderateness of a man daring to be suspected—not guilty, but suspected of harboring in his bosom some of the pulsations of honest liberty. Two years! That is not enough for these Senators. No; it is not enough! In the times of the Inquisition it would have been enough for Spanish cruelty, and even now I fancy that I can see the Vatican from its eastern porch raising its hand above the head of the honorable Senator from California, one of his disciples, and saying, "Well done, my servant; you are pursuing exactly the course that was observed in the Spanish Inquisition; you are true to Spanish instincts; you are true to the spirit of persecution, and you can laugh while Sanguily bleeds, sighs, and perishes." Says Lee:

Sanguily had proved himself a very brave and efficient officer in the Cuban war from 1868 to 1878, and had been wounded seven times.

A glorious record for this lover of liberty; a glorious example to set our children; yes, to us, who have forgotten how our liberties were bought and the wounds that were kept bleeding and festering for them for more, perhaps, than twenty years after our Revolutionary struggle. Sanguily sets us an example, Mr. President, that I would that the younger men of this country could feel. Yet I know that amongst the eldest who have got to be either of the class or the advocates and defenders of the class called the business interests have forgot the last instincts of patriotism, and are now just as corroded as were the British persecutors of the Americans in the times of the Tories and the Whigs of the Revolution.

It was therefore naturally supposed that sooner or later he would have joined the insurgent side of the war now in progress in this island.

That was a natural supposition. That was all there was to the case, for Sanguily, feeling incompetent to take further part in open rebellion, abstained like an honorable man from secret council with the enemies of Spain. Why? Because he felt the obligations of his oath of allegiance to the United States and felt that he had no right as an honorable man to violate it. Hence, when a message was sent to him inviting him to become a member of the insurrection he positively refused and cut himself aloof from all associations of the kind. Because a man is honorable enough to obey his allegiance to the United States Government he is not only arrested in Cuba and tried upon that suspicion which naturally, says Lee, grew out of his situation, but he is here persecuted as a convicted man, and some Senators on this floor rejoice that that poor man, in the midst of his persecutions, has been subjected to a condition from which he could not escape with his life otherwise than by confessing guilt when he was not guilty and accepting pardon when he was not entitled to pardon, because no guilty thought had entered his mind or had ever found expression in his action.

That is the situation of Julio Sanguily, a man who, in point of honor and in point of that respect which the world owes to a high character, will compare favorably with the character of the best man on this floor. Now, says Lee:

On the 28th of November, 1895, or, say, nine months and four days after he was arrested and thrown into a cell at the Cabañas fort, he was tried and sentenced to be imprisoned for life.

He omits to mention the chains.

An appeal was taken to the supreme court of justice at Madrid, which decreed, upon some technical ground, that Sanguily should be retried.

On the 21st of December, 1896, his second trial commenced, and ended by his being again sentenced to perpetual imprisonment.

From this second sentence an appeal has been taken, which, whether successful or not, will greatly lengthen the time he has already passed in his cell.

The lawyer who defended this prisoner in his first trial now looks from the bar of a cell adjoining his in the Cabañas fort, and I am informed that the lawyer who managed his appeal before the Madrid court has suffered in consequence thereof, so that it may be difficult to procure in Madrid another person versed in the law who will consent to manage for Sanguily the appeal proceedings.

Lee foresaw what the result of that appeal would be in Madrid. The lawyer who defended him before had been disbarred and robbed of his office, and he was left there without money, without friends, without an advocate, without even the friendship of the American minister, to run the risk of an appeal that would condemn him to an African fortress in chains for life.

Well, sir, I do not wonder that Sanguily might be frightened and forced under this duress even to permit his counsel to ask for this pardon. I do not know hearts that are quite strong enough to stand the Spanish Inquisition repeated in Cuba. We have read enough of the martyrdom of that Inquisition to understand that it requires nerves more steel-like than we have got and perhaps consciences purer to be able to withstand even for the sake of God and His Church the persecutions of the Inquisition of Spain. These men have no power to touch a suspected prisoner otherwise than with cruelty, and the punishment of a man in Cuba who is suspected of running counter to the will and policy of the Spanish Government begins the very minute that he is landed in a prison. They begin to punish him before he is convicted, and if they find that the evidence is not going to be sufficient to convict him, they punish him until they wear him out before giving him a trial. That is what was done in Sanguily's case. Yes; you American Senators see it and know it as I do. You stand here and look it in the face and do not blush.

He says:

Only a few days after the arrest of Sanguily a proclamation was issued—

Mark this—

Only a few days after the arrest of Sanguily a proclamation was issued offering amnesty to all persons in arms who would give themselves up.

That proclamation, we are informed, was issued.

It seems that this ought to apply to persons who had been arrested without arms in hand. Two other Cuban officers of distinction—Ramon Perez Trujillo and José María Timoteo Aguirre—were arrested, I am told, at the same time as Sanguily and for the same reason, namely, because it was thought that they would engage in the war. After a short incarceration they were liberated.

They were not American citizens, Mr. President. There the discrimination commences, and presently I shall have something to say on authority about discrimination. Every American who holds naturalization papers who has been placed under arrest—and few have escaped in Cuba—has been discriminated against deliberately and with cold blood because simply he held those naturalization papers. Now, it is a well-known fact that an American citizen of Spanish origin or of a Spanish name who has got a passport or certificate of naturalization from the United States does not dare to show it when he is arrested for fear he would be killed on the spot. That is the sort of character we have got in Spain. We deserve it. But, Mr. President, I do not enjoy it. It is not pleasing to me; it may be to others.

And when it was day, the magistrates sent the serjeants, saying, Let those men go.

And the keeper of the prison told this saying to Paul, The magistrates have sent to let you go: now therefore depart, and go in peace.

But Paul said unto them, They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison; and now do they thrust us out privily? nay verily; but let them come themselves and fetch us out.

And the serjeants told these words unto the magistrates: and they feared, when they heard that they were Romans.

And they came and besought them, and brought them out, and desired them to depart out of the city.

Ah, Mr. President, it was Paul's valor and vigor alone, and he possessed it, too, in a degree equal to that of any man, I suppose, who ever lived, fortified as he was also by Divine inspiration. But it was the glorious title of Roman citizen that sheltered him on that occasion, and it was that that he appealed to.

He could not be taken with that character upon him and be degraded by being thrust out privily; he could not be stolen out of that prison or seduced out of it.

Mr. DAVIS. He declined a pardon.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. He would yield to nothing but the Roman right. He stood upon it, and it stood him in hand, and these persecuting magistrates, after they had sent their sergeant to induce him to accept this pardon and this secret dismissal from prosecution, came to him and begged him that he would accept an open door and depart from the city.

Mr. President, that was nearly two thousand years ago, and that example has stood here upon Sacred Writ for the encouragement and protection of men who enjoy the citizenship of great countries which are willing to protect their citizens wherever they may be found; and we find, while that sacred principle is connected with the highest development that is possible of human character, perhaps the most distinguished and the noblest Christian that lived in the world was made the subject of this sort of persecution, he claimed not the power of angels to release him, as he could have done, but he appealed to his Roman citizenship, and the very judges and persecutors who had cast him into prison came and opened the door and begged him to depart.

Sir, we had an example of that kind secured to us in the Constitution of the United States and in the glorious and priceless name of American liberty; but Senators on this floor turn their backs upon it and spurn it, and ridicule the man who claims the title of American citizen, and call him a fraud, because they suspect in their evil imagination that there is possibly some lapse in the proceeding by which he was naturalized. They stand here to claim that he is not an American citizen. Why and for what? In order that he may justly suffer imprisonment for life in chains. Leave it to them upon the law and the facts, and Sanguily would have gone to Ceuta without the possibility of restoration, and passed his life in chains.

The point was astutely made here. If it had been made in that Spanish court—and it is only because the Senator from Massachusetts was not a Spaniard that it was not made—if this point had been made in a Spanish court, it would have prevailed there doubtless, and probably would have prevailed in the Senate of the United States and in the mind of our heroic President, and Sanguily would have been condemned to life in chains. That is the judgment you have pronounced upon that poor man. The American Government says he is a citizen; you say he is not. This is a question between two governments, not a question between poor Sanguily and even the Senator from Massachusetts. The American Government has said in the very initial proceeding, started and reported in the dispatch from our consul-general, Ramon O. Williams, on the 25th day of February, 1895, that this man is an American citizen, and gives the date of his naturalization, the number of his passport, and the fact that he had a passport given him by this Government. Then he proceeds to say that he took that passport and returned to Cuba; that he had it registered there in the American consulate and also in the office of the Captain-General. So that this noble character, which he supposed, like the character of the Roman citizen, would even open dungeon doors to his release when he was innocent, would be kept in constant view of the Captain-General of Cuba. There he lived, and no man can say one word to the contrary, an obedient man to that glorious character of an American citizen. He valued it, appreciated it, and acted upon it, and now he suffers for it, and it is all he does suffer for.

Mr. President, I wish to read one little extract from the judgment of the court which pronounced the sentence of death upon Sanguily:

11. Whereas according to article 8 of the civil code and article 41 of the law concerning foreigners, the penal laws are binding upon all persons living in Spanish territory, and as, consequently, the provisions of the penal code are applicable to Don Julio Sanguily y Garit, since his American citizenship gives him only the rights granted by the protocol of January 12, 1877, which rights have been recognized.

There, in the sentence of death upon that man, that Spanish court does him the honor to declare his American citizenship, yet the Senator from Massachusetts snatches from him that tribute to his character, which entered into a document, no doubt the chief factor in his condemnation. All the way back through these papers, every time Sanguily is alluded to, he is mentioned as an American citizen.

Sanguily was educated in the Northeast, in New York City, I believe, elegantly educated in our colleges, for he belonged to a family which was able to bestow upon him those accomplishments. When his native country became involved in the war of 1868 to 1878, the young man went there, and very soon was rewarded with the commission of a general, and he earned it upon the field in the noble wounds that he bears upon his body, in the gallant conduct which he performed there and which has become a part of the history of Cuba. This man, while incarcerated, prepared two papers in his own defense, one of which he addressed to the Government of the United States and the other was evidently prepared for his counsel. I will insert those papers in my remarks without now stopping to read them, with only the observation that I think it would put the best lawyer in this Senate to a pretty severe task to prepare a better paper than either of them.

The papers referred to are as follows:

[Inclosure 2 in No. 2312.]

Mr. Sanguily to Mr. Williams.

SIR: I, Julio Sanguily, imprisoned in the Cabaña Fortress for the supposed offenses of rebellion and kidnaping, appear before you to protest of the unjust imprisonment suffered and the concluded violation, victim in both charges.

In the first I have been sentenced by only five judges. Have been indicted and put in prison by virtue of a warrant founded in the circumstantial evidence of the process originated before the military jurisdiction.

Besides, I have been subjected to a new trial by the civil authority, which is not in accordance of the protocol of 1877.

According to that protocol the law of procedure that has to be applied to the citizens of the United States is the one of April 17, 1821.

That law directs from articles 19 to 23 an especial procedure, by virtue of which every act of the process must be with the consent of the defendant's counsel. Article 23 says that the witnesses must testify in the presence of the defendant and his counsel.

Article 24 says the presiding judge must pronounce sentence.

Article 25 says that after sentence has been pronounced the case must be carried to the (audiencia) and the parties to be heard there again (article 28) pronouncing definite sentence within the third day by six judges.

Laying aside the warrant of process and imprisonment founded in the facts of the case originated before the military jurisdiction, the undersigned could never have been tried by oral process, because the protocol of 1877 objects to it, and says that the citizens of the United States can not be tried only by the law of April 17, 1821, with entire publicity regarding the witnesses, who have to testify in the presence of the defendant's counsel, who can make any remarks he may deem necessary, first pronouncing sentence by the judge, and then with new proof by the audiencia, and that composed of six judges (article 27).

The exponent has had only one sentence, by virtue of a law that is not applied, and that sentence has been pronounced by the audiencia, composed of five judges, sentencing to perpetual chain.

Article 2 of the protocol has reference to the law of April 17, 1821, and also articles 4 and 5, all in reference to the citizens of the United States.

Such is the law in force regarding citizens of the United States. And the general consulate objected against military jurisdiction, the one subjected by the exponent. The Captain-General acceded to the demand of the general consulate by merits directed in article 1 of said protocol.

Though another Spanish law may have been promulgated following that of 1821, it is not possible to lay aside without the accord and consent of the United States of the one particularly determined in the protocol, i. e., the citizens of the United States must be tried by the law of April 17, 1821, more advantageous than by secret process, by which the Spanish subjects are subjected to.

The law of 1821 also demands proofs in order to convict, and the Spanish law in force, or say that one of the oral process, authorizes the laying aside of the proofs and the conviction or discharge, only in conscience of the judges. And the conscience of the judges of the Spanish tribunal toward the undersigned is not a guaranty sufficiently impartial, taking into consideration the political offense and the important part taken by the undersigned in the last war.

In the case of kidnaping, as in the previous one, the protocol and law of April 17, 1821, is not applied and is subetituted by the oral process.

The exponent has not consented to the law that has been applied—

In the first place, because the treaty has a public character and can not be renounced individually; in the second place, because it designates an obligation of the Spanish Government which has to be fulfilled; in the third place, because, as it appears in this case, did not know the existence of a law that favored me so much, an ignorance that can not be imputable to the Spanish authorities, necessarily cognizant of the treaty, which did not wish to apply in prejudice to a citizen of the United States; in the fourth place, because the Spanish criminal law, in article 8, declares that the criminal jurisdiction can never be prorogued.

Then it can not be said that the undersigned has been submitted to a criminal jurisdiction, which does not belong to him, proroguing to that jurisdiction his own.

The undersigned does solemnly swear, in the name of the Almighty God, that, until now, did not know the existence of the law of 1821, and being imprisoned since February 24, 1895, and sentenced in one of the cases, by virtue of a law to which is not submitted, but excluded by the protocol of 1877, appears before his consul with the present protest, against the arbitrary and violation of the law of which is a victim, that through the representative of his nation may be elevated to the United States Government, so that it may obtain the immediate liberty of one who is suffering imprisonment illegally and has already been sentenced unjustly, and besides that I demand from the Spanish Government an indemnity in the sum of $500,000, damages caused by the said Government in depriving me of my liberty arbitrarily decreeted and against the solemn law of treaties.

At the date of this protest and claims of damages the undersigned has already suffered one year and eleven days of illegal imprisonment in a fortress.

So the United States Government can not consent that, contrary to the expressed laws, a citizen of his nation be deprived in such a manner of his own liberty by a foreign Government.

JULIO SANGUILY.

CABAÑAS FORTRESS, March 6, 1896.

Memoir presented to the United States Government by Julio Sanguily, a citizen of same, demanding his liberty and indemnity of the Spanish Government for reason of the unjust imprisonment of which he is the victim.

The treaties and protocols in force between the United States of America and Spain relating to its citizens and subjects are laws.

The first treaty in the chronological order is that of 1795. That treaty was ratified in 1819 for another one, with exception of articles 2, 3, 4, and 21 and the second clause of the twenty-second.

The seventh clause of the treaty of 1795 remained, therefore, in force. Said clause says: "That the citizens of the United States shall be granted free access to all judicial procedures and to be present at all hearings and examinations relating to same."

As that clause was not sufficiently clear, several conferences were had between the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid and the minister of state of His Majesty the King of Spain, agreeing definitely in 1877 to sign on the 12th of January of said year the protocol, which, according to its preamble, has for its object the following: "To terminate amicably all controversy as to the effect of existing treaties in certain matters of judicial procedure and to make declaration on both sides as to the understanding of the two Governments in the premises and respecting the true application of said treaties."

That protocol has been signed by the Hon. Caleb Cushing, for the United States, and by His Excellency Señor Dn. Fernando Calderon y Collantes, minister of state of the Spanish Government, the president of the cabinet, His Excellency Señor Dn. Antonio Canovas del Castillo, confirming same and communicating it to the governor and Captain-General of Cuba through a royal order.

Said protocol ends with the following words: "In order to give the Government of the United States the completed security and good faith of His Majesty's Government in the premises, command will be given by royal order for the strict observance of the terms of the present protocol in all the dominions of Spain, and specially in the Island of Cuba."

The exponent was indicted by military jurisdiction in two cases—one for the rebellion, and the other for kidnaping. The consul-general of the United States demanded immediately of the Spanish authorities, and referring to article 1 of the protocol of January 12, 1877. The Spanish authorities, recognizing the justice of that demand, consented that the case would pass to the civil jurisdiction.

This action of the Spanish Government in the Island of Cuba proves that they recognize the protocol, because the first of its clauses was fulfilled. But the Spanish Government has not recognized all the other clauses of the protocol, having violated them, and the exponent goes to prove it.

All the protocol is united to the law of April 17, 1821. That law has never been applied to Spanish subjects in the Island of Cuba. It is an especial law of Spain, and if it was published in Cuba in El Diario del Gobierno Constitucional de la Habana, dated July 10, 1821, was a new reference; and so it is that article 37 of same declares that the dispositions of that law as understood are limited to provinces of Spain and adjacent islands.

The mentioned law of April 17, 1821, was never a law in Cuba for the Spanish subjects. But the Spanish minister by common consent with that of the United States having selected it exceptionally, to proceed and resolve only when concerning to citizens of the United States.

In accordance with the treaties, the citizens of the United States condemned by the Spanish authorities in criminal cases must be subjected to the especial law exclusive of any other law.

Examining now the protocol of 1877, said protocol having been fulfilled by the Spanish Government only in the first clause, article 2 refers to those who may be arrested or imprisoned by order of the civil authority for the effects of the law of April 17, 1821.

Article 3 refers to those who may be taken with arms in hand, mentions as law for the citizens of the United States, adding: "In conformity with the provisions of articles 20 to 31 of the same law."

Those articles from 20 to 31 direct that the trial must be public, the witnesses testify in public in the presence of the accused or counsel; that the counsel or the accused can make observations or examine the witnesses; that after the evidence the counsel may expose to the judge all he may deem convenient to his client, and after the counsel has been heard the judge may pronounce sentence.

The sentence pronounced by the ordinary judge shall be referred to the audiencia of the judicial district, in accordance to article 5 of the protocol, referring again to the law of April 17, 1821, and before the audiencia, according to this law, the citizens of the United States can present new evidence, and his counsel speaking afterwards, the audiencia, composed of six judges, among them necessarily the president, shall pronounce sentence lastly.

The law of April 17, 1821, which the protocol guarantees, has not been conceded to the exponent, and has been condemned by another law in which the process has been secret. The witnesses have not testified in the presence of the accused or his counsel, and has been subjected to oral process where there is only one, sentence having been pronounced by five judges and not by six, as the law of April 17, 18-1, requires.

Has already been condemned in one of the cases, and the other is being finished in the same manner.

Besides, in the oral process, conviction can be agreed without process at the conscience of the judges, and the law of April 17, 1821, says "that the crime charged in the indictment must be fully proved."

The exponent is suffering imprisonment in a military fortress nearly twelve months for reason of a law not included in his case, therefore violating the agreement of the treaty or protocol.

Moreover, the imprisonment is founded in the facts and antecedents instituted in the case by the military jurisdiction where the cases were initiated.

In the protest accompanied with this exposition swore in the name of Almighty God not to know the law of April 17, 1821, a law that protected him so much, and now repeats the same solemn oath. Therefore invokes in the name of justice that the liberty taken from him so arbitrarily be restored immediately.

Besides the damages caused by the privation of his liberty, add the injury caused his honor, charging him with the infamous crime of kidnaping, a charge of which he is entirely innocent; and said charge had been published in the newspapers on several occasions.

The two newspapers inclosed, La Lucha and Diario de la Marina, having the largest circulation in Cuba, published to the injury of the exponent his complicity in the case of kidnaping, instituted against him by the mystery of a secret process.

The imprisonment and the case of kidnaping have been realized, applying to him a law of which he was excepted by virtue of a treaty between the United States and Spain.

How much is the damages value?

The nation that breaks a treaty to imprison conveniently a foreign subject exempted by a law of said treaty and subjects him to an inquisitorial proceeding by which he is dishonored through the infamous and repugnant nature of the crime charged him, such nation is obliged to pay the damages occasioned so arbitrarily.

The exponent estimates the damages caused by privation of his liberty and his honor, the two most valued treasures of the human being, in the sum of $60,000.

It must be taken also into consideration that the exponent, besides suffering imprisonment since February 24 of last year, has been incommunicated during twelve days, thus separated from his family and the world; that cruel and arbitrary incommunication was not even ordered by the civil authority, but by the military jurisdiction, an authority twice unqualified—first, because it was a military authority prohibited by the treaty, and, second, because the incommunication was effected contrary to the law of 1821.

The inclosed copy of protest of the consul-general of the United States, dated April 5, 1895, confirms the above fact.

From the prison he claims justice from the Government of his nation and invokes in the name of said justice and the law of treaties to demand of the Spanish Government his immediate liberty and also the immediate payment of the indemnity lawfully claimed.

In order that the Government of the United States may have full knowledge of the case, inclosed is copy in Spanish of the law of April 17, 1821, also copy in English of the Cushing-Collantes protocol, which refers to the former law.

Confirming the facts mentioned in the protest and memoir, the Spanish tribunal that passed the sentence for rebellion did not consent to send to the United States Government authenticated copy of the process and imprisonment, refusing previously that the consul-general of the United States should examine the case; and that opposition of the Spanish authorities was because they did not wish that the United States Government should be aware of how the treaty of 1877 had been violated, not having observed the procedure of the law of April, 1821, notwithstanding the cases against the accused had been transferred to the ordinary tribunal, that in the procedure the rules of the treaty should be observed.

And it can not be any other reason founded by the refusal of the judicial authorities that the United States Government should see the cases mentioned.

There can not be any ignorance alleged on the part of the Spanish tribunal. No tribunal ignores the laws of its country; therefore everything has been the work of bad faith.

JULIO SANGUILY.

HABANA, March 6, 1896.

Sanguily is a man of elegant accomplishments, a man of noble aspirations, a man of honorable deeds, who to-day would greatly prefer death to dishonor, and he is buffeted and kicked about in the Senate of the United States, derided and mocked at, simply because, not that he has appealed to us for justice, but because on the 1st day of February, 1897, the President of the United States, in obedience to a resolution offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], sent in the record contained in the State Department of the treatment of that man. The Senate waited upon it, notwithstanding the honorable Senator from Florida next pursued this subject by a resolution, which he insisted that we should consider, and he pressed it, sir, with that vehemence and strength which is due to an honorable Senator inspired with thoughts of justice toward suffering manhood. Finally we took it up, because we felt that there was no hope for Sanguily but pressure to be brought at least by the Senate of the United States.

In the very first communication which was made by Ramon O. Williams this amnesty is called to the attention of our Government, which applies to all men who had even taken part in the insurrection by agreement or by overt act, whether they were found with arms or without arms, that they should be pardoned, should be amnestied, whenever they came in and submitted to the authorities. That amnesty was issued while Sanguily was locked up in prison. He was arrested on suspicion the day before the revolution broke out. While he was locked up in prison, this amnesty was issued. Of course we supposed, and everyone else supposed, that that would naturally dismiss the Spanish prosecutions against him. His offense, if committed at all, must have been committed antedating that amnesty and before he was locked in that prison, for a conspiracy was all that they have ever charged. Here stood the offense perfect and complete, if it had ever been committed, at the date of the pronouncement of that amnesty.

Why, then, was he not entitled to the benefit of it? Ah, sir, the reason stands out prominently that, while everybody else got the benefit of it, Sanguily was an American citizen and was discriminated against. That is the only reason. No man can argue out of this situation. You may shut your eyes to it and run away from it, but when you allow common sense and reason to operate in respect to these facts, that is the situation, and that is the result.

There stood that amnesty. When Sanguily was put upon trial he pleaded it. His counsel got up in court and called attention to it, stating that the proclamation of amnesty was made when Sanguily was locked in jail, and that he was not taken—and the evidence showed that he was not taken—with arms in his hands. He pleaded discharge from prosecution. The court overruled the plea, and held him. Who can account for that upon motives or sentiments or ideas of justice or right or honesty or uprightness? He was held contrary to that plea, because, and only because, he was an American citizen. When the counsel for the State came to argue that case against Sanguily upon this manufactured evidence, which would not have convicted a negro of bad reputation of chicken stealing in the South, he goes on to descant upon that very fact.

I can not for the moment lay my eye upon that paper, but it is in one of the papers which is published in this report, in which the prosecuting attorney dwells with great emphasis and decidedly bad feeling upon the idea that Sanguily should have left his native land and come to the United States, where nothing but hostile sentiment pervaded the people of this country, and have accepted naturalization at the hands of this Government. A decent man in his common senses, in his rational mind, who could not find a reason for preferring the Government of the United States to the Government of Spain under any circumstances, must have some very strong attractions or attachments in Spain or Cuba to draw him away from this hospitable and splendid land, where this young fellow was educated in our colleges.

He had acquired a love for the people of the United States; and that is one of the bitterest things that Spain has to encounter, that her young men and her young women of good family and good sense and good breeding and good fortune, or good talents and abilities of any kind, witnessing the splendid developments and the glories of this great Republic just across the narrow divide of waters between Florida and Cuba, stand there and look from their home trees out upon the north, and desire above all things that God would bless them with American citizenship. I hope that the flame that burns in Cuban hearts to-day in behalf of this splendid Republic, its institutions, its people, and its history, will continue to burn until the altar shall be built in Cuba upon which that flame shall fasten itself like the fire which descended from heaven upon the altar in the temple of David, and stand there and burn forever.

I will turn to the last trial and see what the counsel who prosecuted had to say about the case. In the first part of the trial the diatribe was much more prolonged and specific and cutting; it was even almost equal to the irony of the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], which seemed to be quite red-hot, if not white hot, against Sanguily and all the people who had any respect for his wounds, his character, and his devotion to human principles.

The fiscal—

That is, the prosecuting attorney—laid special stress upon the testimony of the accused, who had stated, when interrogated by the court, that he had not accepted the convention of Zanjon, of 1878, but had gone abroad to the United States, whence he did not return until 1879, and then as a citizen of the United States, and bitterly censured him for his acts of renouncing his nationality, of accepting the citizenship of another country, even of such a country as the United States.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator kindly inform me from what page he is reading?

Mr. MORGAN. Pages 93 and 94 of the report of the committee—here the fiscal took occasion to pronounce a decided eulogium of the United States—of that friendly and powerful nation that feels bound in dignity to protect its adopted citizens who had privileges here that even those who had not ceased to be Spaniards did not enjoy, and of again returning to the land of his birthplace, of his forefathers, and of his wife and son, to resume his residence, and forgetful of the duties imposed on him as a foreign citizen to remain neutral, to conspire to head a revolutionary movement, issuing commissions, and executing preparatory acts of rebellion such as recruiting men and acquiring arms and ammunition.

And while he says the proof is positive upon those propositions, there is not one particle of proof. That man lied in his throat in the presence of the court when he said so upon the record.

Now, why are we censuring Mr. Sanguily for putting in this plea of amnesty? He did not get it. He was pressing his plea of amnesty for two years. That did not require of him to make any false confessions; that did not require of him that he should come and plead guilty to an accusation of rebellion and treason, and that he should acknowledge that he deserved the punishment of a life in prison and in chains. I should think that anyone would prefer to receive the benefits of an amnesty, which requires nothing of him in the existing state of facts, to being compelled to put in a plea for pardon for an offense of which he knew he was not guilty.

And, Mr. President, they seem to have had a great deal of trouble in getting this plea of pardon properly hurried up. The President of the United States has not yet got any information of it; he can not have; otherwise he would have self-respect enough, if he did not have enough for the Senate, to send in a message here informing us of the consummation of this pardon, in order that we might cease work upon this resolution. He can not have it in honor and justice to his own reputation as a man and President; otherwise it would have been here. The Senate of the United States in solemn deliberation acting upon a matter of this kind, entitled to receive evidence of this kind or information of this kind sent from the President of the United States, is denied any recognition in the premises: the evidence is withheld, if it exists, and we are expected to decide this case according to our own feeble judgment—a lot of intelligent gentlemen whose opinion, alas, amounts to nothing! That is what the Secretary of State said about us, and he said it in the ear of the Spanish minister here, in order that Spain might have a sufficient degree of contempt for this body and the other House of Congress. "The opinions of a set of gentlemen which, when expressed, amount to nothing." "I am the great I am of this Government; I am the Government, and what these other men may do dangling about and around the fringe of things, what opinions they may express, may do very well for comment in the social circle or possibly for a question of debate in a debating society, but when you come down to facts, I am the Government; what I do is done, and what I do not do you have no right to touch." That is the situation.

Here came that resolution from the committee. The committee asked to set a day for the consideration of it, although it was another day of chains and imprisonment for Sanguily. If any Senator on this floor had to suffer one such day as that, though he should live for a hundred years, he would never forget that day. The humiliation it would work upon his heart would be so depressing, and the scars that were left there would be so deep and so annoying, that he would forget the most of life when he had to turn to that dismal day spent in a Spanish prison, an innocent man under unjust accusations and deserted by his Government. Sanguily had another day of it, and days have been added since the 1st day of February up to to-day, and for every day added to it somebody is responsible. God and man will both hold somebody responsible for every added day of Sanguily's sufferings in that prison.

Mr. President, when this committee came into the Senate with this report and gave a day upon it, I say there was still another day added to Sanguily's torment, although we could not help ourselves. We knew what was coming here. We knew that Spain had her advocates upon this floor for anything she has attempted to do—not men merely to excuse her, to palliate the situation, but absolute advocates for all the tyranny she has shown in Cuba. We knew that, and we knew we would have to confront it; but we supposed that our duty was none the less incumbent and peremptory on that account, for the man who has a great and solemn duty to perform can not stop and look at the obstacles that may confront him. If he is honest, he will look to the result and will try to reach it, though he may be foiled, as we have probably been here; but the introduction of the resolution put the cable wires into motion, kindled up the fires beneath the sea, and here we find information of a cable arrangement printed in the newspapers here this morning, said to have come across the cable, that Sanguily's counsel, Mr. Dominguez, had entered an abandonment of his appeal from his last condemnation to the supreme court of Spain, and thereupon the Queen of Spain had made it a special case and sat down and granted him a pardon—a pardon by cable! Why? What was the hurry about it? Because the Queen of Spain knew that she could not stand the arraignment that was being made in this Senate.

If that royal head, for which I have great respect, had conceived for one moment that the conduct of her Spanish subjects in Cuba could be justified upon any law, international law, treaty law, law of humanity, she would have said, "My royal word is at stake for the preservation of these laws, and I will not yield by cable a pardon to this man Sanguily. I will have his case set before me on the trial record, and I will examine it," like the President of the United States would examine a pardon petition here upon the record, and determine in his own cool and quiet judgment, according to conscience and right and law, whether or not the man was entitled to a pardon. But here the agreement is cabled to Spain, and as soon as the wires can bring it from the royal hand—the papers state that she signed the pardon with her own hand—without ever looking into Sanguily's case, startled and alarmed by the Nemesis of justice that was about to overtake her, she shrank from the collision and granted this pardon.

The duress, Mr. President, was as great upon Spain even as it had been upon Sanguily. What was the duress upon Spain? Nothing but being confronted with the truth. That was all. This message sent in here and the report based upon it and the resolution reported to this honorable body convinced her that the cheapest way out of this affair was, first of all, to get Sanguily to put himself in a condition of self-abasement and self-condemnation, then to grant him a pardon, and then to escape the fine that she saw she would be obliged to pay for this man's sufferings. "Money makes the mare go," and it seems to have had that effect in this case. "I have got poor Sanguily," says the Queen of Spain, "locked in a dungeon. I have got the waiting wife and little boy outside, who have been for two years living upon the charity of friends; I have got his character in my grasp; I have got him condemned contrary to the treaties with the United States and the law of Spain itself; he is my prisoner, and as much in my power as the timid mouse is in the power of the cat when he is playing with him before he eats him up." That is the way Spain had Sanguily; and then they begged Sanguily to dismiss his appeal in order that they might get a chance to pardon him!

Oh, what welcome news was that to this President in our White House, who has been down upon his hunkers now for two years praying with Spain to release him! How glad his honest and noble American heart must be, and in what wild transports of joy must be his magnificent person when he hears that after all, by the combination between the Crown of Spain and the President of the United States, they have now taken a poor creature and have at last dragged out of him a condition where they can escape paying damage and possibly have the liberty, like the sluggard, of sleeping and snoring while Americans suffer!

That is a lovely thing. There has that much good come out of it, Mr. President. There is one happy heart in this country, and that is the heart which for two years has been evading its duty of relieving Sanguily, when it was charged in the very first, the initial correspondence on this subject, that the treaty was being violated, as has often been charged since. That heart, which was engaged with all this knowledge of the breach of the treaty before his eyes, driven in upon his consideration, now finds that after two years of consideration, weighty consideration, he is able to escape through the sufferings of poor Sanguily.

Mr. President, he escapes two duties, one to his country and the other to his manhood. I am willing that he should escape both. I am willing, if it is to be the fate of Sanguily, that he should thus be immolated, thus destroyed; but I wash my hands of it here in the presence of the Senate of the United States. I am not guilty of having destroyed this poor man. I am not guilty of that act of cowardice which has exposed him to extreme penalties and compelled him to listen to extreme demands of injustice, demands which violate the integrity of the Government of the United States in its relations to him. I am not guilty of that, thank God! I commend those who can find any comfort in Sanguily's fate and condition to a diligent search for that comfort, for I must think when in their most thoughtless moments the name of Sanguily shall hereafter occur to them there will be a startling jar in the bosom that will satisfy them that some great wrong has been done which can properly be laid at their doors.

Now, once more about the question whether the matter was presented in regard to these treaties; whether it was pressed upon the consideration of the Government of Spain by the Government of the United States. Joseph A. Springer, our consul at Habana, in the absence of Mr. Lee, I suppose, or in the absence of Mr. Williams, May 4, 1895, made a communication to Mr. Uhl, who was then First Assistant Secretary of State. I will not read the whole of it, as some parts do not bear particularly upon this matter:

I have now the honor to accompany copy and translation of a communication received to-day from the Acting Captain-General to the effect that orders had been given to have copies made by the special judge of instruction of those parts of the cause instituted against Julio Sanguily and others, for conspiracy, for rebellion, which affect the American citizens, Messrs. Julio Sanguily and José María [Timoteo] Aguirre Valdes, which copies would be shortly sent to the civil jurisdiction of this city, his excellency having waived the military jurisdiction in favor of the civil jurisdiction as respects the said parties.

I understand that to-day is the tenth day that Mr. Sanguily has been "incommunicado" (in solitary confinement) by order of the military authority, not allowed the visits of his family, or even to see his advocate appointed by him for his defense.

That was pretty close confinement.

On the 26th day of April Mr. Williams had sent a dispatch to Mr. Uhl, which I will read:

I have the honor to inform you that in compliance with the telegram of the honorable Secretary of State of the 16th instant, I addressed a communication yesterday to his excellency the general in charge of the Captaincy-General, asking for the transfer of Mr. Julio Sanguily on the second charge from the military to the civil jurisdiction for trial, in accordance with the requirements of the agreement of the 12th of January, 1877, and entering at the same time the formal protest of the Government of the United States before the government of this island against any further delay in his transfer to the civil jurisdiction; protesting alike against all the proceedings hitherto practiced or that may hereafter be practiced by the court-martial now trying him, because they are in clear contradiction of the said agreement between the two nations.

Mr. President, I have read this more for the sake of reaching the ears of some of the members of the committee who seem to overlook the proposition than for any other purpose. I desire to show that in the very beginning of this proceeding, under the instructions of the Department here, our consul was directed to protest that no part of the military proceeding held against Sanguily in either of these cases should form a part of the judicial or civil proceedings afterwards had, but they had to start de novo; they had to abandon the inquisition of the military tribunal; they had to abandon the record which they made ex parte and without conferring with him at all. They could not, under the act of 1821 and the protocol of 1877, use that evidence against Sanguily, for that law, which is made a part of the treaty, expressly forbids it.

So our Government protested and kept on protesting. Now, here again, as late as December 24, 1895, Mr. Williams again writes on this subject:

With reference to previous correspondence relating to the arrest and trial of the American citizen Mr. Julio Sanguily, for rebellion against the sovereignty of Spain in this island, I have now the honor to inclose a copy and translation of a communication received under date of the 8th ultimo from the chief justice of the royal audiencia of the province of Habana, asking for a literal copy of the formal protest I addressed the governor-general by order of the Department on the 25th of last April—

That is, from April to December—

against all the proceedings that had been practiced then or that might be practiced in the future by the military jurisdiction in the trial of Sanguily, because contrary to the provisions of the Collantes-Cushing protocol of the 12th of June, 1877, which requires that the above should be tried exclusively by the ordinary or civil jurisdiction.

I also inclose copy and translation of my answer to the chief justice, with which I accompany copy of my said protest. I sent a copy of this protest to the Department with my dispatch, No. 2491, of the 25th of April last.

There we began to make that point in April. As soon as this man had got out of the first case of secret imprisonment so that the consul could have a chance to see him and know what was in his case, right then and there our Government protested and continually it has protested up to this very hour that no part of the military proceedings against Sanguily could be used against him under any circumstances or in any phase of the case.

But they have gone on, and up to the very last trial, Lee himself protesting again about it, they still resorted to their military proceeding. They still took what they call their ex parte confession of the witness, made at the hour of 11 the night he had been arrested, doubtless alarmed, with no one to protect him, no one to know whether the officer took a correct record of his case or not. That is called here an open trial in a place of justice. Ah, Mr. President, how are the mighty fallen!

Now, I look back to earlier days, during the former Administration of Mr. Cleveland, and I recall to the attention of the Senate the case of A. K. Cutting, over in Mexico. Do you remember it? Thomas F. Bayard was then Secretary of State, and I trust that in his honorable association with the great and brave people of Great Britain he has not forgotten enough of his Americanism and enough of British sentiment also to have humiliated himself to the position of the present Secretary of State upon these questions. I hope not, and I believe not.

Now, what is it? Here is Bayard's dispatch to Mr. Jackson, of Georgia, who was then our minister to Mexico:

You are instructed to demand of the Mexican Government the instant release of A. K. Cutting, a citizen of the United States, now unlawfully imprisoned at Paso del Norte.

Ah, heroic language, and it worked its results right along.

By the documents before me, the following facts appear:

On June 18 last A. K. Cutting, a citizen of the United States, who for the preceding eighteen months had been a resident "off and on" of Paso del Norte, Mexico, and as to whose character for respectability strong evidence has been adduced, published in a newspaper of El Paso, Tex., a card commenting on certain proceedings of Emigdio Medina, a citizen of Mexico, with whom Mr. Cutting has been in controversy. For this publication Mr. Cutting was imprisoned on the 22d of June last at El Paso del Norte, in Mexico. * * * But the paper was not published in Mexico, and the proposition that Mexico can take jurisdiction of its author on account of its publication in Texas is wholly inadmissible and is peremptorily denied by this Government.

He did not wait to find out what the supreme court of Mexico would say about it—"peremptorily denied."

It is equivalent to asserting that Mexico can take jurisdiction over the authors of the various criticisms of Mexican business operations which appear in the newspapers of the United States. If Mr. Cutting can be tried and imprisoned in Mexico for publishing in the United States a criticism on a Mexican business transaction in which he was concerned, there is not an editor or publisher of a newspaper in the United States who could not, were he found in Mexico, be subjected to like indignities and injuries on the same ground. To an assumption of such jurisdiction by Mexico neither the Government of the United States nor the governments of our several States will submit. They will each mete out due justice to all offenses committed in their respective jurisdictions. They will not permit that this prerogative shall in any degree be usurped by Mexico, nor, aside from the fact of the exclusiveness of their jurisdiction over acts done within their own boundaries, will they permit a citizen of the United States to be called to account by Mexico for acts done by him within the boundaries of the United States. On this ground, therefore, you will demand Mr. Cutting's release.

But there is another ground on which this demand may with equal positiveness be based. By the law of nations—

Mark the expression—

By the law of nations no punishment can be inflicted by a sovereign on citizens of other countries unless in conformity with those sanctions of justice which all civilized nations hold in common.

Ah! what a splendid statement that is of that glorious code, the law of nations. Let me repeat it:

By the law of nations no punishment can be inflicted by a sovereign on citizens of other countries unless in conformity with those sanctions of justice which all civilized nations hold in common.

Where is there a nation, Turkey not excepted, that will hold in common with Spain the incarceration of this bleeding and beseeching American citizen for his treaty rights for two years under suffering such as human pen or tongue can never describe, and what government, but the Government of the United States, under the Administration of Grover Cleveland, could stand by quietly and silently and see such things inflicted without so much as raising its hand except to provide a way to slip out of the case? How are the mighty fallen, I repeat! When this grand Bayard made this utterance of international law, our Government and the Senate had not recoiled from their dignity and their power and their duty. We had not then become the apologists of tyranny, cruelty, murder, rape, arson, and universal destruction. We are now. He proceeds:

Among these sanctions are the right of having the facts on which—

Let me call Senators' attention to this—

Among these sanctions are the right of having the facts on which the charge of guilt was made examined by an impartial court, the explanation to the accused of these facts, the opportunity granted to him of counsel, such delay as is necessary to prepare his case, permission in all cases not capital to go at large on bail till trial, the due production under oath of all evidence prejudicing the accused, giving him the right to cross-examination, the right to produce his own evidence in exculpation, release even from temporary imprisonment in all cases where the charge is simply one of threatened breach of the peace, and where due security to keep the peace is tendered. All these sanctions were violated in the present case.

That is in the case of the publication of the alleged libel. They were all violated here in the face of the official authority—violated against protest made by the counsel of Sanguily in both of these trials. He was convicted upon testimony that was not sworn to, upon reports of police officers who did not even give the names of their informants. What would Bayard have said to that? What has he said about it—for the cases are exactly parallel?

Mr. Cutting was summarily imprisoned by a tribunal whose partiality and incompetency alike were shown by its proceedings.

Take the proceedings here, Senators, and see whether they do not show incompetency or else mischievous partiality and malice.

He was refused counsel.

This man was not only refused counsel, but the counsel who defended him for no offense that Mr. Lee mentions, to say the least of it, except defending him, at the time of the latest dispatch to our Government, was occupying a cell whose prison bars confronted those of Sanguily. The witness who testified before and had exculpated him in respect of the message that he bore to Betancourt, showing that he did not know Sanguily, never met him, never spoke to him, had been shot to death in his Spanish prison. The counsel who took up the case on appeal to Madrid, and argued it there and gained it, was deprived of his office, disbarred, and is now suffering the penalties of that privation.

Mr. Cutting was summarily imprisoned by a tribunal whose partiality and incompetency were alike shown by its proceedings. He was refused counsel—

So was Sanguily—

he was refused an interpreter—

So was Sanguily—

to explain to him the nature of the charges brought against him.

Here is the testimony in the case of the Competitor. A poor little man—I do not call him a poor little man except in the sense that he is a young man; he belongs to a family that is greatly respected, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] on my left knows the family—(to Mr. JONES) do you not know him?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I know the family.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a respectable family in Arkansas. The young man went out to make his first reputation in life as correspondent for a Florida paper. He got on a little sloop of perhaps three or four hundred tons burden, merely going to the Island of Cuba, without arms or preparation for war or enlistment or anything of the kind. He was seized there. He stayed on board the ship. He did not go with the balance. He did not feel like escaping, because he felt no guilt. He was seized, put into prison; he was made incomunicado; he was tried under military authority. They started to try him under that, and transferred the trial into the civil court. Here are two gentlemen who were sworn before the Committee on Foreign Relations. Dr. Diaz was one of them, and the other was the correspondent of the New York World. Here is their testimony in respect of the trial in the Competitor case. One of the defendants, I think it was young Melton, after the court had been engaged in the prosecution of him for an hour or so, was asked to stand up. I believe I am putting it correctly. Here is my colleague in the examination, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], and he will correct me if I am wrong. When he stood up, he was asked what he had to say against the accusation.

He said: "I do not know what it is. I do not read Spanish. I have heard something read here, but I do not know what it is. I can not answer to something that I do not understand." Instantly judgment of death was pronounced upon him, and that man is in Cabanas prison to-day. That was eighteen months ago, was it not? It must have been eighteen months ago. Dr. Diaz was there and saw it. He testified in the same way with the correspondent of the New York World. They both came here and swore to it. A perfect mockery! I have applied twice in the last eighteen months to get from the Government of the United States information about the Competitor case, and the first time the President returned the resolution and said it was not compatible with the public welfare to give us the information.

Now, there was a pretense, beyond question, utterly unjustified, for section 2001 of the Revised Statutes expressly requires him as President to make a return to the Congress of the United States of the facts attending all such cases. Instead of obeying the statute, he would not even respond to a resolution of the Senate, but took shelter under the privilege we gave him of hiding the facts if he did not think it was compatible with the public welfare to furnish them. Then, finally, here seven or eight days ago we got, in conjunction with the other case, the case of Melton and several other Competitor prisoners, a statement; but that statement is entirely imperfect. It contains no record of the trial. It contains nothing of the evidence adduced. It does not contain the accusation. It is the most meager thing that ever was seen. And our Government has slept upon the rights of this young man from Arkansas, and he is there, a native-born American citizen, if an Arkansas man can be a native-born American citizen, and I suppose he can. He is there; he is that sort of a man; he has been suffering from that time to this for no offense in the world except that he accepted employment from a little newspaper in Florida and went down there to try to get information upon which he could get a little start in life.

There is this young American citizen. Another case is here, but there is no use of going over the cases. They are numerous. Here is the record. I have not the time to stop to read them. I will conclude what I was reading from Mr. Bayard, and then I will close. I know the Senator from New York has an engagement with the Senate at this time to-day, and I ought not to have trespassed upon the time as much as I have:

He was refused counsel; he was refused an interpreter to explain to him the nature of the charges brought against him; if there was evidence against him it was not produced under oath, with an opportunity given him for cross-examination; bail was refused to him; and after a trial, if it can be called such, violating, in its way, the fundamental sanctions of civilized justice, he was cast into a "loathsome and filthy" cell, where, according to one of the affidavits attached to Mr. Brigham's report, "there are from six to eight other prisoners, and when the door is locked there are no other means of ventilation"—an adobe house, almost air-tight, with a "dirt floor."

That would be a palace beside the place Sanguily has been in.

He was allowed about 8½ cents, American money, for his subsistence. He was not furnished with any bedding, not even a blanket. In this wretched cell, subjected to pains and deprivations which no civilized government should permit to be inflicted on those detained in its prisons, he still languishes, and this for an act committed in the United States, and in itself not subject to prosecution in any humane system of jurisprudence, and after a trial violating the chief sanctions of criminal procedure.

These circumstances you will state as giving an additional basis, a basis which, if it be established, this Government will not permit to be questioned for the demand for Mr. Cutting's immediate release.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the difference between the Cutting case and the Sanguily case, and in doing so I want to premise that I sympathize thoroughly with this Cuban patriot. I denounce and have denounced the hardships and cruelties to which he has been subjected. I think they are contrary to civilized procedure of any kind. But, in simple justice to the present State Department, I desire to point out that the Cutting case referred to what is known as extraterritorial crime, and was discussed by Mr. Bayard as a question of international law upon which this Government took a very pronounced position, in consonance with that of all the other civilized governments, that a crime committed in the United States could not be punished in the Republic of Mexico or within the territory of any other civilized government than the United States. He properly stood upon that proposition, and made a peremptory demand for the delivery of the prisoner, who had been arrested under those circumstances.

In the case of Sanguily we have an arrest made for an alleged crime that is recognized by a treaty between the United States and Spain. If I remember rightly, he was arrested for participating in or being cognizant of——

Mr. MORGAN. He was arrested for conspiracy.

Mr. GRAY. Or for a conspiracy looking to a rebellion against the authority of Spain. That was a municipal offense. Sanguily was within the territory of the country against whose laws he was charged with having conspired.

Mr. MORGAN. So was Cutting.

Mr. GRAY. And the offense alleged to have been committed was committed in that territory, and that offense was recognized, as I said before, by solemn agreement between the United States and Spain, in which it is said that:

1. No citizen of the United States residing in Spain, her adjacent islands, or her ultramarine possessions, charged with acts of sedition, treason, or conspiracy against the institutions, the public security, the integrity of the territory or against the Supreme Government, or any other crime whatsoever, shall be subject to trial by any exceptional tribunal, but exclusively by the ordinary jurisdiction, except in the case of being captured with arms in hand.

The diplomatic activity of the State Department was exercised from the time of his arrest down to the successful issue of that activity in having him tried before a civil tribunal in conformity to the obligations of this treaty. The correspondence which has been sent to the Senate shows that activity was unremitting, that demands never ceased on the part of the Department of State until the trial before a civil tribunal, as secured by that treaty, was obtained for Sanguily. That is the difference between this case and the case of Cutting.

Mr. MORGAN. The last point of difference is a very valuable fact. On the part of Mr. Bayard demands did cease. The demand was made for his instant release—it was enforced. On the part of Mr. Olney, demand after demand was made, refused by every tribunal that got hold of it in Cuba, defiantly and insultingly, and still not enforced. The demands were both entirely distinct. Bayard succeeded because he stood up to what he said; Olney failed because he did not.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Olney, if the Senator will allow me again, succeeded in getting all that he had a right to demand under the treaty, and that was a civil trial, the trial of Sanguily before a civil tribunal instead of a military tribunal.

Mr. MORGAN. The Department in three or four dispatches said, you can not have jurisdiction to unite proceedings of a military court with a civil court. Your military proceedings have not anything to do with it; and yet they tried him upon that united record against which our Government protested every time. There was the main ground, the want of jurisdiction in the court; that and the fact that there were only five judges, when there ought to have been six.

It is true that in a large sense the cases are not parallel in respect to the locality at which the offense was alleged to have been committed, and yet the Government of Mexico did contend, and very rationally, it appears, too, that the publication of a libel is of the essence of the offense, and that the publication was notoriously made by Cutting in Paso del Norte, because he sent the papers there addressed to different individuals, through the Mexican post-office, and communicated his libel against this man there in Paso del Norte through as many readers as he could get it into the hands of; he made his publication, in fact, there. But Bayard does not stand there. The Senator from Delaware omits the second point. Here is where I stand with Bayard. I will repeat it:

But there is another ground on which this demand may, made with equal positiveness, be based.

After getting rid of this territorial or extraterritorial question,

By the law of nations no punishment can be inflicted by a sovereign on citizens of other countries unless in conformity with those sanctions of justice which all civilized nations hold in common.

That is a broad enough text for me. No man can say that that great principle has not been violated flagrantly and defiantly in the facts of this case.

Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senator from New York for having intruded upon him to the extent I have done. Before taking my seat I wish to say in behalf and in the defense of the Committee on Foreign Relations that, while we have from time to time received intimations that efforts were in progress to obtain a pardon for Julio Sanguily, some of those intimations doubtless came through the State Department or from the State Department, but they came to the chairman of the committee as sacred personal secrets and I for one refused to listen to them. I will not permit myself to sit in a committee and listen to personal confidences between the chairman of that committee and the Secretary of State which I am forbidden, when I hear the facts, to come into the Senate and descant upon to my brother Senators. You do not send me to that committee room for any purpose of secretion. But this way of getting along, which I despise, is what we have been subjected to in this business; and every once in a while would outcrop an intimation that if we did not go to the bottom of this thing, if we did not make a report but gave delay, Sanguily would be pardoned. I never saw the day when, if Sanguily were my brother, I would have asked pardon under the circumstances unless I found that I belonged to some government that did not have sufficient self-respect and regard for the rights of American citizenship to d mand my right.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator doubt that he was one of the instrumentalities through which this pardon, if it be a pardon, was obtained? Does he not see the connection between the report of the Foreign Relations Committee of the joint resolution and the action taken in Madrid? The papers all stated that it was over there reported, and that they were considering the matter, and in consequence of it were very much agitated. Does he suppose there would have been any action taken of any kind if he had kept quiet; even an attempt to evade it or get out of it?

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations have not taken up one fact, hint, or suggestion outside of the message of the President of the United States. They have presented this case exclusively and solely upon the facts stated in that message.

Mr. STEWART. I do not question that.

Mr. MORGAN. While there might have been many grounds of suspicion and belief, we have not considered them. We have confined ourselves to the record of facts.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator does not comprehend what I mean. I mean to say there would have been no movement whatever anywhere if it had not been instigated right here in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. MORGAN. It had not been for two years, and I supposed a year's trial was long enough to find out what they would do. They allowed Sanguily to swelter in that horrible den, that prison, secluded not from the joys of life, but from life itself, health, and everything of the sort for two years; and it was not until there was activity in the Senate and in the Committee on Foreign Relations that there came this loading of the cables with cablegrams which resulted in his pardon.

Well, I repeat, if Sanguily was my brother, and was circumstanced as he is, I would say to him, "Accept no pardon for an offense unless you are guilty of it." There is time enough for a guilty man to ask a pardon, but an innocent one ought never to be compelled to do it. It is an injustice to him and a dishonor to the man who compels him to do it. This man was innocent upon the face of the testimony. He was innocent under the moral law, the international law, the municipal law of Cuba, under the treaty law. The court that tried him had no jurisdiction, and if ever a case can arise in the United States that more clearly demands the interference of the Government, as it was made by Bayard in that case from which I have just been reading, I hope I shall not live to see it.

What would have been done if the testimonial of Martin Koszta had been examined into before the liner could have been pulled upon the gun that was loaded to sink that Austrian ship in the event he was not surrendered into the hands of the American admiral? Ah! we had admirals then; we had Daniel Websters then; we had men of power, of good, pure consciences, unshaken by the desires of official position or by the tenderness of former political associations.

I regret, Mr. President, that I have been compelled to take the floor in the Senate of the United States, especially upon a bill that is not appropriate to my discussion, and to make this presentation of the facts; but after inviting the Senate of the United States as a member of this committee, along with the unanimous expression of that body, to pass such a resolution as we have reported, I could not consent to say to the world I was satisfied to stop this case upon the rumor of a cablegram announcing a pardon for Julio Sanguily.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate for any length of time. The Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] treat this discussion very lightly.

The Senator from California says that I have been a chronic speaker on the side of Cuba. If that be true, the Senator from California has been a chronic speaker on the side of Spain. I introduced a resolution here to inquire into the facts relating to the death of another American citizen charged to be murdered under circumstances of extreme cruelty by the Spanish authorities in a prison at Guanabacoa, Cuba. I desire to present for the consideration of the Senate—and I shall ask that that resolution be taken up to-morrow—the following dispatch contained in the Herald, and alleged to be authentic:

General Lee calls upon Mr. Olney for a "war ship immediately," and declares, "I can not and will not stand another Ruiz murder."

The dispatch is given, as follows:

OLNEY, Washington:

Have demanded release of Scott, American citizen, who has been kept in prison and incomunicado, without due process law, eleven days.

Trust you appreciate gravity situation and are prepared to sustain me.

Must have war ship immediately. How many ships have you at Tampa, Key West, and southern waters, and are you prepared to send them here, should it become necessary?

I can not and will not stand another Ruiz murder.

LEE, Habana.

I do not know whether this dispatch is authentic or not. Coming, as the former communication did, from Mr. George Eugene Bryson, whom I know, and confirmed by the correspondent of the Herald, I take it that it is authentic; and certainly there should be no objection to a resolution demanding that the Department should make an inquiry in regard to the truth of this statement in a newspaper of the character of the Herald.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Florida know whether the press dispatch in regard to the pardon of Sanguily is authentic?

Mr. CALL. I do not.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator knows as much about one as the other.

Mr. CALL. I know as much about one as the other.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the question just asked by the Senator from Alabama induces me to say a single word in regard to what I think has been abundantly displayed by the extracts read from this correspondence during the Senator's speech. They have shown, and he has stated, the activities of the State Department from the moment almost of the arrest of Sanguily down to this time, exerted in his behalf.

As I said a moment ago, under the treaty obligation imposed upon us equally with Spain, we were compelled to recognize the right of Spain to arrest and hold for trial any person, whether a citizen of the United States or not, who is charged, sufficiently charged, with the offense of sedition, treason, or conspiracy against the institutions, public security, integrity of territory, etc., of Spain. Sanguily having been so arrested and tried before a military court, protest was at once made by the Department of State of the United States and a peremptory demand was made that treaty obligations should be respected, and he was turned over to the civil court to be tried according to the stipulations of that treaty. That trial was had according to the procedure, I presume, obtaining in Spain in courts of that kind, very different, I imagine, from that to which we are accustomed in this country where the common law prevails. It would seem that in Latin countries the harsh rule obtains that a prisoner is presumed to be guilty until he is proved innocent. I understand that depositions can be read against him without that security which attaches to every person charged in an American or English tribunal of being brought face to face with his accusing witnesses.

But however that may be, we bound ourselves, as we bind ourselves always with countries having that code of laws, to respect their action under their municipal law, and everything was obtained to which we were entitled by the treaty, when we at last did obtain from Spain under this demand, the peremptory demand of the Department of State, that Sanguily should be tried before a civil tribunal.

There were objections to that first trial, which was had, I think, as far back as November, 1895, and an appeal was taken to the higher court at Madrid, a supreme court, an appellate court at all events, and the verdict and judgment in the civil court which had condemned Sanguily was set aside and a new trial was had as late as December 23, 1896.

Now, what could the State Department have done in that interval? We were bound by our treaty, and however sad and deplorable the state of Sanguily was—and I have no doubt it was deplorable and sad in an extreme degree—we were as much bound to respect the obligation that we had undertaken by entering into that treaty as Spain was. So when he was retired after the first trial had been set aside by the appellate court, only as long ago as the last week in December, 1896, and then condemned, upon the application of Sanguily and his counsel the State Department intervened again to have him relieved from the penalty that was imposed upon him by Spanish law and in a Spanish court. And from that time to this, so far as this correspondence goes, and so far as all the information I have been able to obtain goes, the State Department has been active in season and out of season in pressing upon Spain the propriety and necessity of relieving Sanguily from the penalties of the law under which he had been condemned. At last, after the not very long interval since December 23, 1896, those intercessions and that interference on his behalf have resulted in his pardon and release, and we have in the newspapers to-day telegraphic statements—doubted by some members on this floor whether it be authentic or not—that he has actually been released. But I have the pleasure of holding in my hand an Associated Press dispatch, just received, which I am sure that every member of the Senate and every person within sound of my voice will be glad to hear. It is to this effect:

WASHINGTON, February 26, 1897.

Secretary Olney has received a cable from Consul-General Lee as follows: "Sanguily released to-day."

However he was released, that was the end that we had in view. These other matters may come up afterwards; but here was this American citizen languishing in a Spanish dungeon and our interference was sought that he might be delivered from that bondage. He has been delivered, thank God, and is to-day a free man. So much has been accomplished by an American Secretary of State, who throughout all this sad business has never failed to assert the rights and dignity of this country in behalf of this Spanish-American citizen.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the Senator claim that the conduct of the Spanish authorities toward Sanguily was legal under our treaty?

Mr. GRAY. I claim that we were in no situation to determine that question while this man was languishing in the dreary hours of our investigation in a Spanish dungeon; that the first thing to do was to open the prison doors and allow this Spanish-American to go free into the glad sunlight that shines upon the Senator from Virginia to-day, and to share with him the privileges of breathing the free air of heaven. That is what I wanted accomplished, and that is what the Senate has accomplished.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very glad it has come at last, and we can say, at least, that the resolution of the Senate brought in day before yesterday has not delayed it. I would ask the Senator, however, if he takes the ground now that the treatment of Sanguily was legal, why was it that Mr. Uhl on the 21st of May, 1895, took the ground that it was illegal? I should like to know why it was that the State Department of the United States, now nearly two years ago, declared that the military arm had no judicial cognizance over our citizens at any stage, and why it was that these protests were made against the conduct of Spain if it was legal, and, if it was not legal, why we have waited a year and a half to let Mr. Sanguily get the benefit of our action?

Mr. GRAY. That is a pretty long question, Mr. President; but if the Senator wants an answer I will say it is because the American Secretary of State and his assistant, Mr. Uhl, were, in season and out of season, pressing the extreme contention of the Government of the United States against Spain in behalf of this unfortunate prisoner, because they left no point unurged, because they left no energy unemployed, that might produce the result which has been brought about at last to-day.

I am not concerned just now, when Mr. Sanguily is breathing for the first time in these long dreary months the air of freedom, to go back and discuss as on a certiorari the legality of this judgment. It may have been illegal. Certainly, according to our Anglo-American ideas of the administration of justice, it violated many of the fundamental rules that ought to govern where the liberty or life of a citizen is involved. But, Mr. President, I do not know but that those rules of administration are common to all Latin countries. I know there is a vast difference between the administration of criminal law in the countries where the civil code obtains and in our own, and that the difference between their codes and ours is very much in our favor. I rejoice that we live under a system of laws that secures the rights of the citizen and of the humblest person who is brought before the bar of a court charged with a serious crime, and that he is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. But what has that to do with the charges that have been made here, I submit, without wishing to use the word offensively, recklessly, to-day against the conduct of the State Department, when every bit of this correspondence, every bit of the evidence, proves its untiring activity in regard to the case of this Spanish-American citizen, who has been in Cuba all these years with the protection of his naturalization papers in his pocket?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware one more question. Why was it that our consul, in pursuance of instructions from the State Department of May 16, 1895, uttered the protest to the Spanish Government in the name of this country that "All proceedings hitherto practiced in this case, or that may hereafter be practiced in this case by the court-martial now trying this American citizen, because they are in clear contradiction of the said agreement between the two nations?" I ask the Senator if he considers that the State Department has done its duty, in permitting an American citizen to lie incarcerated for two years after laying before the government that holds him a formal protest and charge that it is lacking and illegal, and if he means to defend upon the floor of this Senate such ation as this?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I am not here by any means to defend all the proceedings, or any of them, that have taken place in the courts that tried Sanguily. I think that that case and some others are a disgrace to the civilization of our age. I think that cruelties have been practiced upon the Island of Cuba upon men who were entitled to the treatment which human beings are entitled to everywhere, cruelties that put that country almost out of the pale of the protection of the family of civilized nations. But we are dealing, and the State Department is compelled to deal, with Spain as one of that family of nations with whom we have treaty obligations; and I have read already in the hearing of the Senate what some of those treaty obligations are. They unquestionably recognize the right of Spain to arrest and try before civil tribunals persons charged with the crime of treason or sedition or conspiracy against the institutions, laws, or security of the King of Spain.

This man having been so arrested and tried before a military tribunal illegally and contrary to the obligation of that treaty, protest was made by the State Department immediately, in the very dispatch to which the honorable Senator from Virginia refers me, April 25, 1895, less than two months after he was arrested, stating peremptorily, and in language as emphatic as could be employed, that the Government of the United States would not tolerate for one moment the trial, condemnation, and punishment of this man by a drumhead military court. Thereupon, and as a result of that interposition, he was turned over to a civil court, and that civil court having tried him and condemned him, an appeal was taken to the appellate tribunal in Madrid, the supreme court of judicature there, and the judgment and condemnation obtained in that civil trial was set aside and reversed, and then another civil retrial was had only last December, the 23d and 24th of the month.

What could we have done in the meantime? Spain could have said, "We are resorting to our accepted code of laws," doing just as the United States would have done if, during the rebellion, a person had been charged with communicating with the enemy and tried in a district court of the United States and England had protested that the prisoner was an English subject and that he must not be tried at all. We would have appealed to our statute book and said, "We have nothing to do with the justice of the findings of the jury or the judgment of the court; our municipal laws govern, and we must obey and stand by our municipal law."

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me, it was like the case of McLeod.

Mr. GRAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to remind the Senator that this man was not found in rebellion, and it was especially provided that as to those without arms in their hands they should be differently treated.

Mr. GRAY. So we demanded; so the Secretary of State demanded, for it was because he was not found with arms in his hands that this treaty gave the right to the United States to demand his trial by a civil tribunal.

Mr. DANIEL. It was done again after the demand.

Mr. GRAY. What was done?

Mr. DANIEL. He was again "incomunicado," put in prison again upon another charge.

Mr. GRAY. I can not talk Spanish.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought you talked Spanish.

Mr. GRAY. You attribute too many accomplishments to me.

Mr. DANIEL. You are talking pretty good Spanish now, if you will excuse me.

Mr. GRAY. I am trying to talk pretty good English, or pretty good American, just as the Senator chooses.

Mr. DANIEL. I merely wanted to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that Mr. Uhl calls the attention of our consul to the fact. He says:

> By no fiction can proceedings of military judge instructor be deemed the act of an ordinary court of first instance. Assumption of such cognizance in Aguirre case and rearrest of Sanguily, after submission to civil court, apparently for mere purpose of asserting military jurisdiction in summary proceedings, were an exercise of functions against which you will enter protest, reserving all rights of this Government and its citizens in the premises.

Now, I will ask the Senator if he does not think that, after making so many protests in one case after another, the presence of military power on the scene of action would have improved the situation?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia is rather trying to lead me off into a discussion of some minute details of this correspondence. All I started out to assert, and what seems to provoke his questions, has been that so far as this correspondence goes, so far as any evidence that we have before us in this Senate or elsewhere that I know of goes, the State Department has done its duty in actively pressing the rights of Sanguily as an American citizen, and claiming and obtaining for him a trial in accordance with the stipulation of that treaty.

Now, the Senator says, "Oh, but there was no evidence before that court to convict him." I do not know but the Senator is right. I do not know but that in Spain or in Cuba in times of great excitement courts may be organized to convict. God knows it has been charged that courts in this country of ours have been organized to convict in times of great excitement, and have convicted American citizens. No one who recollects the military tribunals of war times will deny this.

But, however that may be, the State Department could not go down and stand before the tribunal and urge before it an argument as counsel for the defense could urge on the law or the facts tending to the acquittal of Mr. Sanguily. The King of Spain is as much bound to stand by the judgment of his courts as the President of the United States is to respect the judgment of a State court or of a United States court.

The Senator from Massachusetts reminded me a moment ago of the celebrated case of McLeod in 1838, was it not?

Mr. HOAR. I think in 1842 or 1843.

Mr. GRAY. In 1842 or 1843, during an émeute across the American border, McLeod had committed a murder. He was tried in an American court and acquitted. The British Government demanded possession of him on the ground that he was a member of a military expedition, if that be the fact—the Senator from Massachusetts will correct me if I am wrong—and he was tried and acquitted in a court of the State of New York.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, Alexander McLeod was a Canadian, a British subject. He was arrested in this country on the charge of having been a member of an expedition on the steamer Caroline. At any rate, an American citizen was killed in that expedition. Thereupon the British Government claimed that he was in one of the British military forces, and demanded the discharge of McLeod, he not being responsible for an act avowed by his Government. Our Government insisted that that question must be tried in a New York court and that the question of the validity of that defense must be set up there. Contrary to the demand of the British Government, the trial was proceeded with.

Mr. GRAY. That was in a State court of New York?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; a State court of New York, and the man was acquitted.

Mr. DANIEL. By the courtesy of my friend, I will ask one more question, if it will not interrupt him. The Senator agreed in reporting the joint resolution demanding the release of Sanguily, and is in favor of it, is he not?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not know by what authority the Senator speaks of what happened in committee.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg pardon of my friend. He is in favor of the resolution, is he not?

Mr. GRAY. I am not in favor of the resolution now, that Sanguily is released. I do not want to have him arrested again.

Mr. DANIEL. But you were in favor of it?

Mr. GRAY. I am more in favor of Sanguily's liberty than I am of succeeding here in the trial of a certiorari case with the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. That is all.

Mr. GRAY. And Sanguily will have no thanks to give to the eloquence of the Senator from Virginia, in which we all so much delight——

Mr. DANIEL. I am not seeking for thanks.

Mr. GRAY. If it should result in some irritation of that somewhat harsh and despotic Government and should place him in bonds again. Let us get him home first, if his home is on this soil, and put our arms around him, and say, "You are free, and we intend that you shall stay so." That is all I want done with Sanguily. And then we will treat this matter with Spain afterwards.

Mr. DANIEL. I wish to ask the Senator if he has official information of Sanguily's release?

Mr. GRAY. I have here a dispatch purporting to be from the State Department, a telegram from Consul-General Lee, dated to-day, which reads:

Sanguily released to-day.

That that is a fitting end to all our aspirations here, we all agree.

Mr. DANIEL. By whom is that dispatch signed?

Mr. GRAY. It is an Associated Press dispatch, stating that Mr. Olney states to its correspondent——

Mr. DANIEL. A press dispatch not signed?

Mr. GRAY. An Associated Press dispatch obtained from the reporters' gallery up there [indicating], stating that Secretary Olney had shown to its representative a cable dispatch from Consul-General Lee, reading:

Sanguily released to-day.

I take it that that is correct.

Mr. DANIEL. Is there any condition imposed upon it?

Mr. GRAY. That is all I know about it.

Mr. HILL. Without intending to offer any opposition to the Indian appropriation bill, which I do not desire to do, I will say that there are matters to be considered in executive session which require attention, some important matters which we should act upon. It is for that purpose alone that I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator to yield one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I am satisfied that the Indian appropriation bill, if we can go on with it, will be disposed of within an hour. I think most of the matters of dispute have been so arranged as that very little time will be taken in the consideration of the bill; and I wish the Senator from New York would waive for the moment his motion to go into executiv session until this bill is disposed of. I assure the Senator that the Indian appropriation bill will take but a very short time, in my belief, and certainly the Committee on Appropriations would feel compelled to go on with the bill unless the Senate feels that it should decide to take up executive business.

Mr. HILL. I see the force of the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa. I therefore ask unanimous consent that in one hour from now we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. Say at the conclusion of the Indian appropriation bill. I hope that will be done.

Mr. CULLOM. There will be no objection if that be done.

Mr. BROWN. I think I shall have to object to an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York accept the modification suggested by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HILL. What is the modification?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To go into executive session immediately after the disposal of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HILL. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that, as soon as the Indian appropriation bill is disposed of, the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GORMAN. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. HILL. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HILL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 48; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Allen,	Chandler,	Martin,	Turpie,
Blanchard,	Chilton,	Mills,	Vest,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW obtained the floor.

Mr. WALTHALL. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WALTHALL. I offer an amendment to come in after the word "services" on page 57, line 2, of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A point of order is now pending. As soon as the point of order is disposed of, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be considered. The amendment can be now considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALTHALL. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the amendment which I propose at this time, as I am obliged to leave the Chamber within the next thirty or forty minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that an amendment which he proposes may be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, page 57, after the word "services," it is proposed to insert:

That the said commission shall without delay enroll the Choctaws now resident in the State of Mississippi as citizens of the Choctaw Nation, and such Choctaws who possess at least one-eighth of Choctaw blood shall be enrolled on a special roll, and are entitled to all the rights of Choctaw citizenship, except in the annuity under the treaty of 1830, as therein provided.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi peremptorily requires that these Indians in Mississippi shall be placed upon the rolls. I have not had an opportunity to examine this question, so as to know whether they are entitled to be placed on the rolls or not, and entitled to a share of the property of those tribes; but I am willing to trust the commission, which have power and authority to investigate the question as to whether they are Choctaws or not and entitled to a share of this property. I therefore offer an amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the one offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the commission appointed to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory shall examine and report to Congress whether the Mississippi Choctaws, under their treaty, are not entitled to all the rights of Choctaw citizenship except an interest in the Choctaw annuities.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I appeal to the Senator from Mississippi to accept that as a substitute for his amendment.

Mr. WALTHALL. I should prefer very much to have the amendment in the form in which I submitted it, but I shall not detain the Senate at this late hour in discussing the matter. I will accept the substitute proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALTHALL. I will ask to have inserted the fourteenth article of a treaty between the United States and the Mingoes, chiefs, captains, and warriors of the Choctaw Nation, made at Dancing Rabbit Creek, on the 15th of September, 1830, and also a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting certain information bearing upon this subject, which he sent us the other day in response to a resolution of the Senate, in order that this amendment may be understood by all concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter referred to by the Senator from Mississippi will be inserted in the RECORD in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none.

The papers referred to are as follows:

ART. XIV. Each Choctaw head of a family being desirous to remain and become a citizen of the States shall be permitted to do so by signifying his intention to the agent within six months from the ratification of this treaty, and he or she shall thereupon be entitled to a reservation of 1 section of 640 acres of land, to be bounded by sectional lines of survey; in like manner shall be entitled to one-half that quantity for each unmarried child which is living with him over 10 years of age, and a quarter section to such child as may be under 10 years of age, to adjoin the location of the parent. If they reside upon said lands, intending to become citizens of the States, for five years after the ratification of this treaty, in that case a grant in fee simple shall issue; said reservation shall include the present improvement of the head of the family, or a portion of it. Persons who claim under this article shall not lose the privilege of a Choctaw citizen, but if they ever remove are not to be entitled to any portion of the Choctaw annuity.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 15, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the following resolution of the Senate, dated 11th instant, viz:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the following information:

"First. A copy of the memorial of the Choctaw Nation of December 24, 1889, relative to the Mississippi Choctaws.

"Second. Deposition of Greenwood Leflore, ex-chief of the Choctaw Nation, of February 24, 1843, before United States Commissioners Clayborne and Graves, relative to importance of the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830.

"Third. Whether or not the Choctaws entitled to remain in Mississippi by the fourteenth article were reported by United States Commissioners Murray and Vroom to the President of the United States on July 31, 1838, as having been in a great number of cases forced to remove from the reservations granted them by the fourteenth article.

"Fourth. Whether or not the Mississippi Choctaws were parties to any subsequent Choctaw treaty, or have ever executed a relinquishment of their rights of Choctaw citizenship."

In response thereto I transmit herewith copy of a communication of 15th instant from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and accompanying papers.

As to the question of whether or not the Mississippi Choctaws were parties to any subsequent treaty to that of 1830, or have ever executed a relinquishment of their rights of Choctaw citizenship, the Commissioner says that four treaties in which the Choctaw Nation has been interested have been entered into since that of 1830, but that he can not find in any of them anything to indicate whether the Choctaws in Mississippi were a party to any of them as a distinct faction or otherwise; neither does he find any provision by which the Choctaw Indians in Mississippi relinquish any rights of Choctaw citizenship they may have acquired under the fourteenth article of 1830, or otherwise.

Very respectfully,

D. R. FRANCIS,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 15, 1897.

SIR: I am in receipt, by Department reference for immediate report, of a resolution of the Senate calling for certain information relative to the Choctaws in Mississippi, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the following information:

"First. A copy of the memorial of the Choctaw Nation of December 24, 1889, relative to the Mississippi Choctaws.

"Second. Deposition of Greenwood Leflore, ex-chief of the Choctaw Nation, of February 24, 1843, before United States Commissioners Clayborne and Graves, relative to importance of the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830.

"Third. Whether or not the Choctaws entitled to remain in Mississippi by the fourteenth article were reported by United States Commissioners Murray and Vroom to the President of the United States on July 31, 1838, as having been in a great number of cases forced to remove from the reservations granted them by the fourteenth article.

"Fourth. Whether or not the Mississippi Choctaws were parties to any subsequent Choctaw treaty or have ever executed a relinquishment of their rights of Choctaw citizenship."

In reply I have the honor to inclose a copy of the memorial of the Choctaw Nation adopted by the legislature of that nation and approved by its principal chief on December 24, 1889, said memorial relating to the Mississippi Choctaws.

I also inclose a copy of the deposition of Greenwood Leflore, ex-chief of the Choctaw Nation, taken on February 24, 1843, before United States Commissioners John F. H. Clayborne and Ralph Graves, relative to the importance of the fourteenth article of the Choctaw treaty of 1830 (7 Stat. L., 333).

I also inclose an excerpt from a report made by United States Commissioners J. Murray and P. D. Vroom to the President of the United States on July 31, 1838, in which they state that in a great number of cases Choctaws in Mississippi were forced to remove from reservations granted them under the fourteenth article of the treaty above mentioned. These last two named copies are made from the printed record of the Court of Claims in case No. 12742, "The Choctaw Nation of Indians vs. The United States."

On account of the limited time within which I have to make this report, I have not been able to search the files of this office for the original of the report of the Commissioners from which these copies are taken.

As to the question of whether or not the Mississippi Choctaws were parties to any subsequent treaty to that of 1830, or have ever executed a relinquishment of their rights of Choctaw citizenship, I have to state that four treaties in which the Choctaw Nation has been interested have been entered into since that of 1830, as follows:

Treaty of 1837 (11 Stat. L., 573), by which the Chickasaws were permitted to form a district in the Choctaw country in the Indian Territory, and certain adjustments of rights between the two nations in the lands ceded to the Choctaws prior thereto were accomplished.

The treaty of November 4, 1854 (10 Stat. L., 1116), by which the boundary line between the Choctaw and Chickasaw districts in the Choctaw Nation was provided to be run.

The treaty of 1855 (11 Stat. L., 611), entered into for the purpose of readjusting the relations between the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, and the treaty of 1866 (14 Stat. L., 769), readjusting the relations of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations with the United States after the civil law.

There is nothing that I can find in any of these treaties to indicate whether the Choctaws in Mississippi were a party to any of them as a distinct faction or otherwise. These treaties were negotiated with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations as bodies politic and there is no recognition of any separate factions of either of said nations.

Neither do I find any provision in any of said treaties by which the Choctaw Indians in Mississippi relinquish any rights of Choctaw citizenship they may have acquired under the fourteenth article of 1830 or otherwise.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. P. SMITH,
Acting Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

A MEMORIAL TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Whereas there are large numbers of Choctaws yet in the States of Mississippi and Louisiana who are entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizenship in the Choctaw Nation; and

Whereas they are denied all rights of citizenship in said States; and

Whereas they are too poor to immigrate themselves into the Choctaw Nation: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the general council of the Choctaw Nation assembled, That the United States Government is hereby requested to make provision for the emigration of said Choctaws from said States to the Choctaw Nation.

The national secretary is hereby instructed to furnish a certified copy of this memorial each to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the request that they do all they can to secure the accomplishment of the object of this memorial, and this resolution shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved December 24, 1889.

B. F. SMALLWOOD, P. C. C. N.

This is to certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the resolution of the general council of the Choctaw Nation passed and approved in extra session in December, 1889.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the Choctaw Nation this 30th day of December, A. D. 1889.

[SEAL.]

J. B. JACKSON,
National Secretary Choctaw Nation.

BOARD OF CHOCTAW COMMISSIONERS,
Hopahka, February 24, 1843.

Direct interrogatories to be propounded to Greenwood Leflore, a witness on the part of the United States, summoned at the instance of Messrs. Poindexter and Kirksey, on their suggestion that many of the claims presented by Choctaws for the consideration of this board are fraudulent and void, to be used as evidence in the investigation of said claims.

First interrogatory. Have you any interest whatever, either as claimant, agent of claimants, or otherwise, in any claims under the fourteenth and nineteenth articles of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, which were presented before the former board of commissioners, or which have been presented or are to be presented for the consideration of this board?

Second interrogatory. Do you know of any frauds committed or attempted to be committed upon the Government of the United States by any Indian or class of Indians or their agents in cases of such claims?

Third interrogatory. Do you know or have you heard of any Indian who has ever removed to the Choctaw country west of Mississippi and has since returned to the country ceded by the treaty of 1830 and is now residing here? If you do, give us his name, and describe him so particularly, if you can, that this board may be able to recognize him should he come before them in person; and if any such person be dead give us his name and the names of his family and relations, so that a claim in behalf of his heirs may be detected.

Fourth interrogatory. Do you know how many Indians or heads of families there were who applied or offered to apply for the benefit of the fourteenth article of the treaty?

Fifth interrogatory. Were you not one of the chiefs who negotiated this treaty on the part of the Choctaws, and did you not make yourself acquainted with the extent of the benefits realized by your people from most of its provisions?

JOHN F. H. CLAIBORNE,
RALPH GRAVES,
Commissioners.

The answers of Greenwood Leflore to the interrogations propounded on his direct examination before the board of commissioners sitting at Hopahker, as a witness on the part of the United States, summoned at the instance of Messrs. Poindexter and Kirksey, on a suggestion that many of the claims presented by Choctaws for the consideration of this board are fraudulent and void, to be used as evidence in the investigation of said claims.

To the first interrogatory I answer that I have no interest whatever in any claims under the fourteenth and nineteenth articles of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, which were presented before the former board of commissioners, or which have been presented or are to be presented for the consideration of this board. I was provided for by the supplement of the treaty, and have received from Government a patent for my land. I was also the purchaser of two or three small reservations under the nineteenth article, about which there never has been any difficulty. I have never had anything to do with any claims under the fourteenth article, nor with any under the nineteenth article, which would come before this board.

To the second interrogatory I answer that I do not know of any frauds committed or attempted to be committed upon the Government of the United States by any Indian or class of Indians or their agents in cases of such claims.

To the third interrogatory I answer that I do not know, nor have I ever heard, so far as I can now recollect, of any persons who ever removed to the Choctaw country west of Mississippi and have since returned to the country ceded by the treaty of 1830, and are now residing here, except John F. Price, William Leflore, and Anthony Turnbull. The first is a white man who had a Choctaw family; the second is my brother, and the third is a mixed-blood Choctaw. The first never made a claim for land, not being entitled to a reservation under any provision of the treaty, and the other two were provided for, one by the supplement, and the other, by the nineteenth article, had their lands reserved, and sold them before their emigration west. I can recollect no others, and do not believe I ever heard of any others, and none of them can be claimants before the present board.

To the fourth interrogatory I answer that I do not know how many Indians or heads of families there were who applied or offered to apply for the benefit of the fourteenth article of the treaty.

To the fifth interrogatory I answer that I was one of the chiefs who negotiated this treaty on the part of the Choctaws, and am sorry to say that the benefits realized from it by my people were by no means equal to what I had a right to expect nor to what they were justly entitled by the stipulations of the treaty on the part of the Government. The treaty was made at the urgent solicitations of the commissioners of the Government, and upon their abundant assurances that its stipulations would be faithfully carried out.

Confiding in these assurances and in the honor of Government to comply with the treaty, if it should be ratified at Washington, and conceiving it, under the circumstances, a measure of policy, if not of necessity, so far as the Choctaws were concerned, I urged it upon my people in the face of a strong opposition, which I finally determined, if possible, to remove by suggesting the insertion of the fourteenth article. This article was accordingly inserted, and, believing it removed the principal objection to the treaty, I signed it myself and procured for it the support of many who were previously hesitating and undetermined. After the treaty was ratified I was active in urging forward the emigration of the people, and induced most of those in the part of my district where I resided to remove west. I think there were very few in the vicinity of my residence who applied for the benefit of the fourteenth article, and the most of them, I think, were duly registered and got their lands reserved.

This article was inserted to satisfy those in the southern part of my district and other parts of the Choctaw country who were opposed to the treaty and were inimical to me from an impression which prevailed among them that I wished to sell their country and force them to go west. After the treaty I did not consider myself any longer chief, and as I was engaged in preparing the people for the first emigration, and actually accompanied it, my intercourse with the Indians was confined to those in my part of the country who sustained me in my course and were preparing to remove west, and I never troubled myself about the course pursued by those who had been opposed to my measures, had rejected my advice, and were determined to remain in the ceded country. I do not, of course, know how many of them applied for the benefit of the fourteenth article.

Before closing my answer to this interrogatory I think it proper to state that about three years after the treaty I was present at Columbus during the excitement which arose there at the time of the land sales about the contingent locations of the fourteenth-article claimants, and hearing a remark made by one of the agents of these claimants in a public speech to a large assembly of people, charging the chiefs who had made this treaty with bribery and corruption, I arose after he sat down and retorted the charge of fraud in as severe language as I could command. I was excited, and might have said more than was proper; but I felt, in the absence of any positive knowledge on the subject, that I had a right to impute any motives to one who could make such a serious and unfounded charge affecting my character as one of the chiefs who had been mainly instrumental in making the treaty. I knew that the locating agent, who lived in my section of country, had been furnished with a list containing but few names of persons registered under the fourteenth article of the treaty, but did not at that time know that many had applied to the registering agent for the benefit of this article whose applications had been rejected.

I have never since then taken any pains to inform myself particularly about their claims, and I do not know how many received the benefit of this article, or, being entitled to the benefit of it, failed to realize it. I would also add that the commissioners on the part of the United States went to the ground, at Dancing Rabbit Creek, much prejudiced against me, and would have no intercourse with me. They believed they could make a treaty with the other chiefs without my aid, and attempted to do so. After ten or twelve days of fruitless negotiations with them they failed entirely to make any treaty. The commissioners then came to me and made many apologies for their neglect of me, saying they had been deceived and misled in regard to me by many misrepresentations, and then solicited me to enter into negotiations with them. I then told them if they would embrace in the treaty such provisions and articles which I suggested, the fourteenth article being one of them, I would undertake to make a treaty in two days. They agreed to the articles I suggested, and in twenty-four hours I had the treaty made.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: * * * In all cases where the claimant has been actually expelled from his possession within the five years, or in which the land he occupied had been sold by the Government and surrendered to the purchaser, or where the claimant died in possession, the board have considered the cases as standing on the same ground as cases of continued residence, and have allowed them.

It is proper also to state that since the board received a copy of the supplemental law they are not aware that any case has been presented to them in which the claimant has removed west of the Mississippi. A few such cases had been heard before, and, as they were upon the records, the board have thought it proper to report them with the rest.

There are many cases also in which claimants have removed from the lands occupied by them at the time of the treaty in consequence of the settlement of the whites in their neighborhood. This and the consequences naturally resulting from it, and the proofs offered of its effects upon their minds, have induced the board to recommend such cases to Congress for allowance.

The Choctaw Indians are shy and reserved in their intercourse with the whites, and do not readily mix with them; it is proved in a great number of cases that they have been most wantonly abused and ill-treated by them, and that they could not live in peace in the same neighborhood. The large stocks of cattle and hogs introduced by the white settlers destroyed their crops, and their houses and cabins were torn down, burned, or taken possession of by them when they left home on their necessary hunting expeditions or to seek employment in picking cotton, etc. Under these circumstances they were compelled in a great number of cases to remove.

It is in proof also that many removed in consequence of reports circulated among them that the lands occupied by them had been sold by the Government, and when it was impossible for them to ascertain the truth or falsehood of such reports. They well knew, however, from bitter experience, that whether true or false, they were at the mercy of their white neighbors. The instances are not rare, as the evidence abundantly shows, in which families have been wantonly driven from their homes, and have for several years been wanderers, living about in all seasons in open camps, and seeking a precarious subsistence, which scarcely sufficed to keep them alive.

* * * * * * *

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. MURRAY,
P. D. VROOM.

WASHINGTON CITY, July 31, 1838.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understand the pending question is the point of order raised by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the matter pending at the present time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am ready to vote on the question if the Senate is. I do not care to make any remarks. I ask, however, to have it submitted to the Senate.

Mr. VILAS. Will not the Chair rule upon it? The point of order is addressed to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the point of order is against the amendment beginning in line 19 on page 57, and going down to line 7 on page 59. The point of order, the Chair understands, is that it is general legislation.

Mr. PLATT. I understood when the point of order was raised that it referred only to the clause of the amendment which is found on page 59, relating to the acts, ordinances, and resolutions of the council. I wish that the Senator from Tennessee would confine the point of order to that portion of the amendment.

Mr. BATE. The point of order is against the clause beginning at line 19, where it establishes the court. The point of order first was to apply against the clause beginning on page 57, line 2, "Provided further," but that was stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will please state how far his point of order extends.

Mr. BATE. From the matter in line 19 down to——

Mr. VILAS. Down to line 6 on page 59.

Mr. BATE. Down to line 6 on page 59.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the statement made by the Chair.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to make an appeal to the Senator from Tennessee to withdraw his point of order as to so much of the amendmeat as relates to the courts. It is of such great importance that I trust that he will not make his point of order as to that portion of the amendment.

Mr. BATE. I should be glad to withdraw it if I could consistently.

The clause against which I interpose the point of order is the most vital part in the whole amendment, in my opinion, because it gives jurisdiction to the court. I do not want to lop off the limbs and leaves of the tree and let the trunk stand. It takes away from the Indians every single power they have in the way of settling their own matters by their own courts, which power was granted to them by the Government, and the amendment says exclusive jurisdiction shall belong to the court which you propose to establish. If we are going to wipe out all that, then of course I would yield to the appeal; otherwise I can not. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. VEST. I offered the amendment which eliminates the provisions in regard to allotting the lands in severalty and in regard to the leases, and in regard to the veto power over acts of the Indian council, in a spirit of compromise and in order that the least possible friction should occur as between the Indians and the Government of the United States. I endeavored to explain, to the best of my ability, how impossible it is to administer any law when there are two systems vitally antagonistic and inconsistent existing in the same territory.

Now, the Senator from Tennessee, not satisfied with eliminating the most objectionable features, certainly, insists upon his point of order as to what it is evident is absolutely necessary in the interest of peace and good government not only in the Territory but in the adjoining States. What is the point of order? That the amendment proposes general legislation. We establish a commission by two acts, both of them appropriation laws. We defined in connection with the appropriation of money, as we had a right to do, in my judgment, the functions and duties of the commissioners. The Senate deliberately declared that we had a right to do this, and those statutes are in operation and the commission is in the Territory, and has been there for three years, and it will remain there. It has been successful in its work.

What do we propose now? Simply to enlarge the functions and the duties of the commission. This is a question res adjudicata as far as this tribunal is concerned. The other legislation commenced this work, and we simply enlarge upon it. I shall make no appeal to the Senator from Tennessee, for he will do his duty as I am endeavoring to do mine, but I do appeal to the Senate. Here is a great emergency in regard to an important portion of this country. As the Senator from Arkansas said to-day, most pertinently and truly, if we take a backward step now, if we defeat the amendment on any ground, we give new life to those in that Territory who will insist upon the present condition of things, and that condition is not only dangerous but disgraceful and outrageous beyond any description of mine.

I appeal to the Senate that if ever there has been a case where no technicality should be allowed to come between us and a great duty it is now.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to suggest that a different rule by custom prevails with the Indian appropriation bill than with any ordinary appropriation bill. In every Indian appropriation bill, in order to administer the affairs of the Indian Bureau and to carry out the policy adopted by Congress, it is necessary to incorporate a great deal of legislation, and if this bill is subjected to the rigid rules that apply to other appropriation bills, then there must be a new system altogether.

Both Houses have acted upon the theory that they will put in the Indian appropriation bill all the germane legislation necessary to carry out that policy. Nearly all the legislation in regard to Indians was incorporated in the general Indian appropriation bill, and it must of necessity be so, unless there is a radical change in the entire policy. The technical objection to following the policy which has been followed by both Houses from time immemorial in compliance with a rule that can not be applied to the rest of the appropriation bills is a violation of precedent, because the precedents and practice grow up under the rules and become a part of them. They have the force of rules. The general legislation that is incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill to carry out the policy in dealing with the Indians is absolutely necessary. It has been adopted at every session of Congress when I have been here. It must be now.

Mr. VILAS. I wish to make only one observation. The appeals which have been made here illustrate perfectly well the flagrant violation of the rules of the Senate which Senators wish to accomplish, if possible, in order to carry out their ends. The Senate has made itself a spectacle in the country, not so much for the want of rules as for the want of its own obedience to the rules which are prescribed. It is incumbent upon the presiding officer of the Senate to read the rules and administer them fearlessly and firmly and according to their spirit and meaning. I hope that the rule of the Senate will be observed in this instance and that we shall not set another example to add to those which have drawn upon the Senate deserved comment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The former occupant of the chair has been in the habit of submitting questions similar to this one to the Senate, in order that the voice of the majority of the body might prevail. The temporary occupant of the chair does not feel justified, under those circumstances, in substituting his individual opinion for that of the majority of the Senate. Therefore the question is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BATE. On this very question the Vice-President himself ruled without submitting it to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has examined the ruling upon the item in the bill a few years ago, and finds it entirely different from the present question.

Mr. VILAS. I wish to add one word, since the point of order is to be submitted to the Senate. In the last Congress we passed a law, independently of the appropriation bill, creating courts in the Indian Territory and giving them their jurisdiction. That was general legislation. In former days the President of the United States negotiated with the Five Civilized Tribes treaties in which were inscribed the solemn engagements of the United States to those tribes, and they were ratified by the Senate. That was general legislation.

Now it is proposed, upon an appropriation bill brought in here, not by the committee to whom we have specially referred and delegated jurisdiction to consider matters relating to the Five Civilized Tribes, for we have just such a committee, but brought in here by the Appropriations Committee, and in defiance of the rules of the Senate, to strike down utterly all the solemn engagements of the Government of the United States with those tribes of Indians, upon which they have relied with a trusting faith in the honor of the United States. We propose to change the very law which we passed only in the last Congress creating the courts in that territory, and the Senate is asked to say that that is not general legislation.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate on this question, but it seems to me it is so vital to these civilized tribes of Indians that the Senate ought to consider it. If we are to override the rules of the Senate, let us withdraw the rule; let us set it aside; but if we have it here, let us respect it. In my opinion there can be no question on earth in regard to this being an increase of the judical power, to say the least of it, and if it is, it is obnoxious to the rule. I beg to say further that this right is conceded to the Indians by the most sacred obligation that a government can enter into. You find here every treaty from 1830 down to 1866 and the agreement finally made in 1875, recognizing these rights which we now propose to strike down from the Indians.

I call the attention of the Senate to that fact, because we want to do what is legally right and what is morally right. It is a proposition to put the Dawes law, which is now in existence, into execution there. It has been successful to some extent, and these Indian tribes come along and say, "We are willing to do that; give us a chance; we want time." Now, instead of giving them time, while you hold out that negotiation to them, you brain them with this bludgeon and say, "We will pass this law depriving you of all your rights." That is the situation. We want to strike down these people, while at the same time holding in the other hand the proposition of negotiation. That is presented to the Senate as a moral, an upright, a proper thing to do. I say, it looks to me like it is unmanly, immoral, and vicious legislation.

I know the fate of the Indians is trembling in the balance. It is the sword of Dionysius hanging suspended by a hair as it trembles over the neck of Damocles. A single twitch of the hair may take his life. So it is with the Indians. They are standing upon a pivot, upon the brink of ruin, and the Senate is called upon to knock from under them the last prop that is sustaining them. I hope the Senate will not do so and that we will take action as I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is the the pending amendment in order?

Mr. VILAS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE].

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GEAR. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO, after having voted in the negative). The present occupant of the chair announces his pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON], and withdraws his vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate decides that the amendment is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate take a recess from 6 o'clock until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. I move to strike out the words "full and exclusive" before the word "jurisdiction" in the twentieth line on page 67.

Mr. President, I would be very glad to find some basis upon which—something like justice and decent consideration for the solemn engagements of the United States—we could carry on the invasion of that Indian people by our appropriation bills if the progress of the invasion can not be resisted. The amendment as it is proposed by the Committee on Appropriations undertakes to sweep away the very solemn engagement made by this country with the Five Civilized Tribes. We have, in the manner by which the United States executes its most solemn covenants, agreed to give the Five Civilized Tribes their own government. We agreed to give them their own lawmaking councils, their own courts, and under the courts which they instituted, under the councils which they established, they progressed in their own way to a degree beyond that which any other Indians in this country have ever attained. There was no trouble with their progress, there was no trouble with their development, until white men, in violation of the solemn promises of the United States, invaded their territory and undertook to throw down their usages and customs.

Now, sir, not in response to the necessities of the Indians, not in response to any demands which faults of theirs invoke judgment from us, but purely and simply that the progress of invasion upon their rights may be stimulated and assisted by the United States Government, it is proposed to trample down their courts, their councils, and all there is of their own government which they have maintained under the promise of our protection.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he believes the United States judges selected by the President of the United States, and appointed to preside over the courts in that country, are less honest than the incompetent men who are selected by Indians to preside over their courts?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I do not. I should be much better satisfied to have the United States judges administer the law there than to have the Indian courts do it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is all that it is proposed to do.

Mr. VILAS. But, sir, I have no right to tell those Indian people, when we covenanted with them that they should govern their own country and their courts should administer justice after their laws, that we will take them by the throat and subject them to ourselves. For that reason I move to strike out these words in order that we may extend to our judges jurisdiction to try the cases concurrently with theirs, as a primal step in this invasion. All the force and effect of the amendment which I propose is simply to so far moderate the demand which we are making upon them (or rather it seems to me to be the cruel and unjust invasion of their rights we are projecting) as to strike out those words which shall give our courts entire and exclusive jurisdiction, and leave them to exist side by side with the Indian courts.

Now see, Mr. President, and I hope Senators will recognize where this leaves the case. Our United States courts will then be there in their territory with a completely concurrent jurisdiction with their courts. Already the jurisdiction of the United States courts is conclusive in all cases in which a white man is concerned. All that I am asking to do here now is to prevent taking away from them the jurisdiction of their own courts in suits between Indians themselves. That is all that I ask.

The amendment of the committee undertakes to destroy not their courts for white men, but their courts for Indians. No, it goes a good deal further than that; for if our United States courts are to decide all the causes that arise between the Indians, as well as between Indians and white men, which they now have the jurisdiction to do, if they are to decide all causes of every description, if they are to decide them according to the laws of the United States and the laws of the State of Arkansas extended over that Territory, then all there is left of their autonomous government is gone. What is there of a country whose laws can not be enforced, whose courts are gone, whose officers have no power? And thus it is, sir, that by this single act we are at once stripping those people of every advantage which they have so long possessed with such benefit to themselves, and based upon the solemn covenants of this Government.

Sir, we have been talking here for two or three days about protecting the rights of an American citizen whose citizenship depended only upon some act without the accompaniment of a single article of benefit to this country, and yet all at once we are about to trample down these people who have lived in this country from their birth, whose ancestors lived here, who gave up their own territory to occupy this upon the faith of our obligation to preserve it to them. We will trample them down with a ruthlessness and recklessness of right such as has hardly been shown in Cuba to any of the people who have been abused and injured there.

I would be glad, as I said, to find some way to agree with this amendment, or at least to have it less violent and less oppressive than it is. I appeal to those gentlemen who seek it. If we begin by giving to our courts a concurrent jurisdiction with theirs, I think we have gone far enough at this time.

At the last session of Congress we passed laws which almost denuded them of their rights. Let us not carry it so far at this session of Congress that nothing remains. Let us at least try to preserve the semblance of fair dealing, and if we do add something to the force of the persuasion which the Dawes Commission is addressing to those people, yet let us add it so that in the end we may secure an agreement with them and that this thing shall be done less by the violence of arbitrary enactment than by the consent of the Indians, however that consent may be obtained.

I do not desire, sir, to occupy the attention of the Senate or to protract the discussion, but I can not suffer this thing to pass in this way without some effort to do what seems to me the duty incumbent upon me, much as I should be glad to escape it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few moments ago unanimous consent was given that we should take a recess at 6 o'clock until the hour of 8 o'clock. Since then several Senators have appealed to me to ask that that order may be changed, so that the recess may be taken until half past 7, and that from half past 7 until 8 o'clock be occupied with the consideration of pension bills on the Calendar, and no other business to be done from that time until 8 o'clock. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if this will be agreeable to him, if the Senate will consent to it?

Mr. ALLISON. It will be agreeable to me, if the Senate agrees to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that my request be acceded to.

Mr. BATE. I hardly think that will give sufficient time to Senators to get their dinners and return to the Chamber. I know yesterday evening when we came back we remained here quite a little while before there were more than twenty Senators in the Chamber.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that several Senators on the other side of the Chamber have appealed to me to make this request. There is no case on the pension Calendar in which I am personally interested.

Mr. BATE. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator, but merely make the suggestion. A good many of us live quite a distance from the Capitol.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (to Mr. GALLINGER). Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent to modify the agreement in regard to the recess as I have suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the agreement heretofore made be modified so that the Senate will convene after the recess at half past 7 o'clock instead of 8 o'clock, with the understanding that no other business be done, but that the time be devoted to pension bills on the Calendar.

Mr. VILAS. And no other business but pension bills shall be transacted?

Mr. GALLINGER. That alone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And that no other business shall be transacted.

Mr. BROWN. I understand, then, that another unanimous consent can not be obtained for any other purpose?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No other bills can be considered except those included within the unanimous consent. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BROWN. Is it understood that no other unanimous consent can be obtained?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It excludes all other matters, whether by unanimous consent or otherwise. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. The time is to be consumed in the consideration of pension bills only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unobjected pension bills already on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, it is very unsatisfactory to attempt to debate a matter of this sort under circumstances in which the Senate is placed almost at the close of the session and almost at the close of the day, but I think that I ought to occupy a few minutes' time in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

I know that the Senator from Wisconsin would be glad to have the carnival of crime and the saturnalia of corruption which is going on in the Indian Territory among the Indians and by means of Indian courts put an end to. I am sure he desires that. I think that he recognizes, as we who are familiar with that situation do, that never in the history of the world was there a condition of affairs so disgraceful and so deplorable. The means by which that disgraceful and deplorable condition is kept up is the Indian courts.

Mr. President, I am not going into the question of treaties. It extends over a long period of our history. Men of great legal ability who have gone into it, who have investigated it thoroughly, do not believe that in this provision there is any violation of any treaty which we have made with the Indians, either in the early history of this Government or more recently. But that is too long a subject, too complicated a subject, to discuss in the few minutes which I may be permitted to occupy.

I take the other ground that, if there is any treaty which by its letter stands in the way, that treaty has been violated in its spirit by those Indians, until the United States not only is no longer bound to observe it, but is bound to step in and exercise its duty and its power to take care of those Indians.

The Senator from Wisconsin talks as if they were all Indians who are in control of those courts; as if white people had gone there and invaded that Territory, and were seeking to despoil the Indians. Not at all, Mr. President. The people who are responsible for this corruption, for this deplorable condition of things, are as white as you or I, sir. They are Indians under the Indian law. They have been admitted by the Indian tribes as Indian citizens; they have come in complete control of the Indians, and are running legislatures and courts for their own benefit, and not for the benefit of the real Indians.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator state what is the proportion of whites and Indians?

Mr. PLATT. About one-third of the Indians in the Five Civilized Tribes are full bloods, and two-thirds are either of mixed blood or white people. By the laws of those tribes, when a man marries an Indian woman, he becomes an Indian for all purposes of their laws, and white people have gone there and become Indians by marrying women with Indian blood, for the purpose of enriching themselves and despoiling the real Indians. That thing has been carried on until the whole community have come under the power of those white men, who are now insisting upon treaties originally made with the Indians.

Now, about those treaties. Those treaties were made when it was supposed that a white man would not go to that country. They were made by the Indians upon the representation that they wanted to be kept away from white people and that white people should be kept away from them; that they wanted to live by themselves, have their own courts—their Indian courts, their Indian legislatures, their Indian laws. They have not only violated the spirit of those treaties in this, but they have allowed white people to become Indians. But all those white people who are Indians in that country are not intruders at all. They have gone there by permission of the Indians. The spirit of the treaty whereby we agreed that they should live by themselves and have their courts has been utterly violated by the Indians; and I insist upon it that the United States, in making those treaties, did not absolve itself from the duty, if the Indians so conducted that they were to be overrun by white people, to step in and take care of those Indians, the real Indians, to see that they were not despoiled by white people whom they themselves had brought among them.

Mr. President, there is only one way to remedy this state of affairs, and that is to give our courts jurisdiction there. The Indian courts are so utterly corrupt that injustice is bought in them at every term of the court openly and notoriously. Justice is not administered. If the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin should prevail, giving concurrent jurisdiction to the United States courts with the Indian courts, it would simply amount to this, that the men who were honest would go into the United States courts, and the men who were dishonest would go into the Indian courts, until they would be purely dishonest bodies and dishonest means of the so-called administration of justice.

I do not believe that there is anything in this amendment which violates the spirit of any treaty we have made. I do not believe that the United States, in making an agreement with the Indians, is bound to keep the letter of that agreement when the Indians have so conducted themselves that to keep the letter of it will destroy its spirit and destroy the Indians also.

But with regard to treaties, the Seminoles have none which guarantee them any courts. The Choctaws and Chickasaws have entered into an agreement whereby they have agreed to give up their courts, and if this amendment passes it will not be three months before the other Indian tribes, the Creeks and the Cherokees, will also have agreed to surrender their courts.

Mr. President, this is the most important piece of legislation that has been proposed for the settlement of this difficulty, for the settlement of this disgrace, this burning shame, this blot on our system of government; and the Senators who insist now upon keeping the letter of the treaties, as it seems to me, are sticking in the bark, and are unconsciously asking the Senate to do great wrong and injustice by keeping to the technical letter of treaties.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I wish to say but a few words in response to the remarks which have just been concluded by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. They induce me to present some letters from leading citizens of that country. I have those letters here. I do not propose to comment upon them, but I wish them to go into the RECORD as a controversion and contradiction of what the Senator has said in regard to the morals of those people and in regard to the criminality and saturnalia of crime of which the Senator spoke.

Two of the letters are from judges of the court there, one is from a Baptist minister and there are one or two others from prominent people there. The letters are short, but they show just to the contrary of what the Senator has stated, and show that there is a better average morality per capita there than in any of the States of the Union. There may be troubles in that Territory, as there are troubles elsewhere. Those people are not responsible for that. It is the fault of the white men who are there, the white men who have crowded out the Indians. The Indian has been driven to the jumping-off place, and now that he has reached that condition, you propose to strike him down, and deny him the last vestige of right, which is this little court of his own, where he has his magistrates and constables to administer justice where nobody but Indians are tried. That is what you propose to do now, by giving exclusive jurisdiction to the courts which are to supplant the Indian courts.

Mr. President, the United States courts are already there. Those courts have jurisdiction in cases between white men and Indians and between white men exclusively; but the Indians have a little court of their own, exerting that power which was given them under every treaty. The Senator from Connecticut says the treaties do not do that. I have read the language, and it is in print to-day. They do it in every instance.

Talk about the morals of those people! Mr. President, I challenge history, I challenge the Senator's historical knowledge, to point out, from the day of the rape of the Sabines in Rome down to the present day, an instance where any single nation of people have ever advanced in civilization from a barbarous condition to the condition in which those Indians now are. They have their schools, they have their churches, they have their capital at Tahlequah, with 3,000 inhabitants. How many churches are there, Mr. President? Twelve churches, I understand; at any rate, they have eight or ten, Moravian, Unitarian, Baptist, Methodist North and South, Presbyterian, and others. That is not all. There are negroes there, and they have a separate church for the negroes. They also have their schools, with 200 pupils, male and female, in separate institutions, with separate teachers, at the public expense.

Mr. President, talk to me about these Indians being desperadoes and being immoral and vicious and bad people! We should take the beam out of our own eye before we take the mote out of our brother's. We have these troubles at home all around us daily. I trust matters will improve in that Territory. I hope that the Christian religion will advance and relieve the present state of affairs. The Christian religion has already done much for the people of that Territory. It has elevated them from barbarism into civilization, and it is making advances there now. I say it is historically true, as I am informed, that there are more members of Christian churches and communicants among this tribe of Indians per capita than there can be found in any State in this Union, and yet we are told by the Senator from Connecticut that a saturnalia of crime exists there.

These things, Mr. President, are historic. They may have troubles in the Indian country. There are, of course, marauders there just as there are in other portions of this country. But the gist of this thing is, Will you override the sacred obligation that this country has entered into with these poor creatures?

I have listened here for the last few days, and particularly during the last week of this session, to appeal after appeal in behalf of the unfortunate Cubans. Not only that, sir, but lamentations loud and long have been uttered in favor of the Armenians, inhabitants of a country three or four thousand miles away from us. Furthermore, we have heard much said here about the arbitration treaty. Why is that treaty favored? Because it will benefit mankind. But you say, Does that help us? The very men who advocate that treaty, the very men who advocate the cause of Cuba, and who shed tears over Armenia, are the men who now stand on tiptoe, with their ears pricked to hear a sweet sound that may come from Crete.

It is our duty, sir, according to my view of this matter, to maintain the status quo with these Indians. Let your courts which are there now have the jurisdiction which they at present exercise. We do not propose to disturb that, but do not let us extend their jurisdiction; do not let us make it exclusive; do not sweep away the rights of the Indian in a judicial point of view.

Mr. President, it is a part of their social organism to have these courts, which have been allowed by our Government in every treaty we have made with them. Theirs is a tribal organization; and I say, sir, you may look to the history of the Indian race, and wherever you have found the tribal organization of the Indians has been disturbed you have destroyed the Indians. The tribal relation is their natural condition, and whenever it is maintained as it is amongst these civilized tribes, with the laws of Christianity and the influence of the good people of this country thrown around them, as it has been, you find that they become elevated to a high point of civilization, surpassing, as I have said, any race of people known to history.

The question now is, shall we take the last prop from under them, which is their own courts, thereby giving exclusive jurisdiction to the courts presided over by judges whom we have sent there?

I do not care to say anything further upon the subject, Mr. President, but I hope the amendment will prevail. It is a proper, it is a just amendment; it goes to the merits of this case, and I shall vote for it.

I now formally request that I may be permitted to insert in the RECORD three or four letters of about twenty-five lines each from Judge Parker, Judge Bryant, Mr. King, the principal of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, and Mr. Wisdom, the United States Indian agent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the papers indicated by the Senator from Tennessee will be inserted in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The papers referred to are as follows:

OFFICE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS,
Galveston, Tex., March 9, 1896.

DEAR SIR: As you are aware, for nearly six years I have been on the bench, and among other places hold court at Paris, Tex. During this time my duty has led me to a careful study of the conditions existing in the Indian Territory. The courts at Paris and Fort Smith have improved the Territory very much in ridding the country of lawless men, and if a comparison is made with any adjoining country, considering area and population, it will be found that less crime is committed in the Territory than any contiguous Territory or State of equal size. This is due solely to the fearless and certain enforcement of the law by the above courts.

If you look to Oklahoma, you will find that crime is practically unpunished as compared with the Indian Territory. Many circumstances combine to make the Paris and Fort Smith courts preferable, but the main reason is, the juries are not acquainted with the parties or witnesses, are not related to nor interested in them, except to do their duty firmly and fairly, and consequently the innocent are protected and the guilty punished.

The records of these courts will compare favorably, to say the least, with any court on earth. The Indian is seldom a defendant in my court. The crimes are committed by white men nearly altogether, and they are generally fugitives from justice from the States.

The question of governing the Indian Territory is a simple one. If the United States will follow strictly its treaty obligations and expel all intruders from the Indian country, the question is then settled. The trouble comes from the intruder, and when he is removed, the cause is removed and the trouble ceases.

If Congress puts the Indian Territory into a Territorial form of government, or takes the jurisdiction from Paris and Fort Smith and gives it exclusively to the courts in the Indian country, crime will rule the day; life and property will not be safe. In making this statement I desire to be distinctly understood as not reflecting on the judges or marshals of those courts. They are gentlemen and good officers and will do all that anyone can do to enforce the law. The fault is not with them. If the juries are composed of white men, in many verdicts of fact feeling will determine it, and the Indian will sincerely think it does in all. If the juries are composed of Indians, the white men will think the same. If the juries are composed of both, they will agree possibly in one case out of ten. In any event, either the white or Indian element will have no confidence that the verdicts are impartial. You know there are many feuds in the country, and they play no small part in the enforcement of law.

The Indians and the law-abiding white men in your country have confidence in the juries at Paris and Fort Smith, because they are not involved in the local feuds and local interests, not related to nor acquainted with the defendants, and consequently can have no motive to do other than right. If the United States will expel the intruder, let the tribal relations stand as they are, the question is settled and settled right. Many white men live in the Indian country that are honest and good citizens, but they comply with all regulations, are not in the criminal courts, and this letter does not apply to them. I refer to the large class of white men in your country who live by crime.

I would write more fully, but I am very busy here and have not the time. I will add, personally, it would be to my interest to lose the jurisdiction at Paris; it would relieve me of great labor and annoyance, but interest does not control me. I have given you my real convictions on this question.

Yours, truly,

D. E. BRYANT.

Hon. HOLMES COLBERT,
Washington, D. C.

Charge of Judge Stewart, December 1, 1894:

* * * * * * *

"And I say now, and I say it everywhere, and I am proud to say it, that I lived on the border, right on the edge of the Chickasaw Nation, for years before I came to this country, and I will say that there never has been a more law-abiding people than the people of this Territory. Why do I say it? These people were here for years without law; these white men who came in here with the permission of the Indians had intercourse with each other to protect their rights; they had no law to protect them against crime; yet these men went out and built towns, they erected churches and schoolhouses, and the good order of society was preserved and maintained without law, and now for the world to say that this Territory, as a whole, is more lawless than other new countries is a slander on the good people of this Territory, and it is not true. I have seen it and I know it."

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 20, 1894.

SIR: In accordance with your knowledge of crime in the Cherokee Nation, were there as many as fifty-three murders committed there during September and part of October last, and no attempt to make arrests?

W. A. DUNCAN.

To Judge I. C. PARKER, Fort Smith, Ark.

FORT SMITH, ARK., December 21, 1894.

To Hon. W. A. DUNCAN,
Cherokee Delegate, National Hotel:

In reply to your dispatch of 20th, I state four cases of murder were reported to United States commissioners here as having occurred in the Cherokee Nation during the whole of September and October last. Arrests in all cases.

I think all the cases over which court had jurisdiction were reported. These were cases over which court here had jurisdiction. There were probably as many more cases of murder committed by Indians upon Indians. There was more crime than usual during these months, owing to the number of reckless men attracted to that country by payment to the people of so large a sum of money. The story that there were 53 murders committed in the Cherokee Nation during the month of September and part of October for which no one was brought to justice, in my opinion, is a grave mistake. Some one has imposed on the author of the statement to the committee. I do not believe any such statement is warranted by the truth, and I think a gross injustice is unintentionally done your people by such statement.

I. C. PARKER.

CHEROKEE ACADEMY,
Tahlequah, Ind. T., January 15, 1895.

HONORED SIR: I have read with interest the newspaper report of your reply to the report of the Dawes Commission. Allow me to add my humble indorsement thereto. After a three years' residence in your nation, with perfect liberty to observe your people, and every possible opportunity to study their customs and the administration of your Government, with no possible political limitations, and in a work that brings men of all classes and conditions together on common ground, and having traveled the length and breadth of your country in public and private conveyance, I am free to say that I have ever found the enforcement of law as effectual, and the safety of persons and property as sure as in any of the well-governed Atlantic Seaboard States in which I made my home for many years. And this is especially true of the safety of our women from insult and annoyance upon our streets, or on the highways, where they frequently travel unattended for many, many miles together. I have never heard of a single instance where the slightest insult or indignity has been offered them.

I may say also upon the grave question at issue, merely as the conviction of one who has the best interest of your people at heart, and who has no personal gain or loss in the balance, that any of the plans submitted for a change of government for the Cherokee Nation (I know nothing about the others) must be detrimental to the best interests of the Cherokee people, if not of fatal result to the full-blood Indians.

Believing the position of yourself and your delegations to be the only correct one in the face of the facts, allow me to wish you godspeed toward success in your noble efforts for your people.

WALTER P. KING,
Principal under the American Baptist Home Mission Society.

Hon. C. J. HARRIS,
Principal Chief of the C. N.,
National Hotel, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE, UNION AGENCY,
Muscogee, Ind. T., January 3, 1895.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of December 18, 1894, in which you state that a statement was made on that day, before the House Judiciary Committee, that 53 murders had been committed in the Cherokee Nation from the 15th of September to the 20th of October, for which no one had been brought to justice. You also ask if I have any information to prove or disprove this statement, or if I give it any credit.

I would respectfully state that my information discredits any such statement, and I do not believe it to be true.

I know that the Cherokees, as a rule, apprehend and punish all criminals, and their laws are reasonably well executed.

Whenever I have called upon the Cherokee authorities to assist me in capturing outlaws they have always responded.

Very respectfully,

DEW M. WISDOM,
United States Indian Agent.

J. F. THOMPSON,
Cherokee Delegate, care National Hotel, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we owe to these Indians just the same obligation that we owe to any other class of our population, and that is to secure them a proper government. We practically agreed to do that when we made our treaties with the Indians, but they have shown themselves incapable of managing their own affairs in a way to bring peace and order and quiet and to do justice to the citizens of that country.

Three years ago a committee of this body went down to the Indian Territory and took testimony as to the condition there, and came back and made a report of the condition. That report is on file. It shows the necessity for this class of legislation.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HILL. With the kind permission of the Senator from Colorado, I rise to a question of privilege. I introduced yesterday, in behalf of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], a concurrent resolution calling for the recall of a bill from the President, and said that it could go over until to-day. It was called up this morning, as I supposed it would be, but instead of it another resolution was called up which was not the one I offered in behalf of the Senator from Nebraska. It was waived. I desire to know why it was that the concurrent resolution was not laid before the Senate this morning as a part of the morning business. I ask that it may be called up now and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

Mr. TELLER. Will it take any time?

Mr. HILL. It ought not to.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, no.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What is it?

Mr. HILL. It is to recall a bill from the President, in accordance with the resolution I offered yesterday.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know whether it is simply to correct a clerical error?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; a clerical error.

Mr. HILL. It is not my bill. It is a matter of courtesy on my part to another Senator. The Senate passed the wrong resolution.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think if the Senator from New York could remain in the Senate long enough, he would get full information with regard to the powers of the body. I am glad he has discovered this one.

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; the resolution is correctly drawn.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be taken up. I do not want to spend much time over it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the President be, and is hereby, requested to return to the House for correction the bill (H. R. 9647) to authorize the extension of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FAULKNER. I object to the consideration of the resolution. I do not know the object of the resolution.

Mr. HILL. The Senator knows, permit me to suggest, because I discussed the question with him yesterday.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator never gave me any reason for it.

Mr. HILL. Was not the Senator from West Virginia in the chair when I offered the resolution?

Mr. FAULKNER. I was, but the Senator never gave me any reason why the resolution should be passed. As a member of the subcommittee, I do not know any reason why it should. I can not agree to a concurrent resolution recalling the bill from the President unless I know the reason why it is to be done.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia if he wants to take advantage of the technical mistake of the Presiding Officer in not laying this resolution instead of the other one before the Senate?

Mr. FAULKNER. I would ask the Senator, in reply, if he would want to take advantage of the District Committee when every member of it was engaged in public business elsewhere when the matter was taken up this morning? If they had been here they would have discussed the question, and the propriety of passing the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. When the resolution was submitted almost every member of the District Committee was here.

Mr. FAULKNER. There was——

Mr. HILL. The Senator from West Virginia was in the chair. Why was the wrong resolution presented this morning instead of the one I offered in behalf of my friend the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FAULKNER. That I do not know. I was in the committee room.

Mr. VEST. Let me make an inquiry. Does the Senator from West Virginia state that the right resolution was offered?

Mr. FAULKNER. Two resolutions was offered yesterday, one by the Senator from Nebraska. Then the Senator from New York called the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that it requires a concurrent resolution to accomplish the result he had in view, and at the request of the Senator from Nebraska the Senator from New York, for that Senator, prepared a concurrent resolution and offered it to the Senate, and it went over until to-day.

Mr. HILL. It is there now.

Mr. ALLEN. Was it not in lieu of the simple Senate resolution?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not know how it was offered; I do not remember the language, but it was offered with that view. This morning, while the District Committee was engaged with its public duties, when the morning hour came on, this resolution was passed without any objection whatever. It would have been objected to by the District Committee if any of the members of the committee had been present. I can say that to the Senator frankly.

Mr. HILL. That has nothing to do with it. I was entitled, or the Senator from Nebraska was (for I care nothing about the bill; I know nothing about it; I did it as a pure act of courtesy to him), to have the concurrent resolution laid before the Senate as a part of the morning business. I supposed the resolution laid before the Senate was the one I offered.

Mr. FAULKNER. I made a very fair proposition to these gentlemen. If they can give any reason why the bill should be recalled from the President, then, of course, I will not object to the resolution being considered.

Mr. HILL. What is the Senator's statement?

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator can give any reason why it is the duty of the Senate to recall the bill from the President, I will not object to the consideration of the resolution; but there ought to be some reason given to the Senate.

Mr. HILL. I have already explained that I am not opposed to the bill. I know nothing in regard to it. I was consulted about it by the Senator from Nebraska. He kindly asked me to put it in form, as I have been giving some little attention to the question suggested—the recall of a bill from the President. That is all. It was purely as a matter of courtesy that I offered it. I supposed it was laid before the Senate this morning, until the Senator from Nebraska called my attention to the fact that the wrong resolution was laid before the Senate, not the one I offered.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, that if he can give any good reason why the resolution should be passed and the bill recalled from the President, I will not interpose any objection; but there ought to be some reason stated.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from West Virginia knows the reasons, and he has known them for a month or more.

Mr. FAULKNER. If it is the reason——

Mr. ALLEN. No, no; there are a variety of reasons.

Mr. FAULKNER. If it is the reason as to which I stated, I would oppose the resolution. I will oppose it.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is not in ignorance of the reasons, and he has not been for several weeks.

Mr. FAULKNER. If that is the only reason, then I do not think the public interest would justify us in recalling the bill from the President.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to say that in my judgment the conference report was deliberately slipped in and passed in the absence of several Senators who were known to be antagonistic to the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say in behalf of the chairman of the committee, who does not seem to be present, that he resents any such imputation.

Mr. ALLEN. I know he resents it. I understand the Senator from New Hampshire resents it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not, because I do not know anything about that part of it.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will permit me, I think if he will look at the RECORD he will find that there has been no bill which has had the deliberation, the length of time bestowed on it in the Senate as the bill of which he is speaking and the conference report thereon have had. The conference report was here from the 13th of January until the middle of February.

Mr. ALLEN. I have been in the Senate every day with the exception of a day or two from the opening of Congress until this moment, occasionally being in the cloakroom and out in the committee room, as my duties required me to be. I never could be here when the bill was mentioned by a member of the District Committee. I would come in after a time and find that some order had been made in relation to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. This bill was referred to the Senate committee on the 21st day of December, reported to the Senate on the 13th day of January, passed the Senate on the 5th day of February; on the 8th day of February the conferees failed to agree and reported, and it went back to them; on the 23d day of February, 1897, the conference report was agreed to, and on the 24th of February the bill was signed by the Presiding Officer.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not disputing that. It is not pertinent to the question at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. It shows simply that the bill has had most careful consideration and deliberation.

Mr. ALLEN. Most deliberate, doubtless, but it was always at a time when the opponents of the bill were not present.

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish to say, in justice to the committee, and I think the Senator from Nebraska ought to admit it, that he never called the attention of any member of the committee to any objection to the bill up to the time when he presented the resolution. At least, if he did so, I never heard of it, and I never heard of any objection either to the bill or to the conference report except from the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I would not sign the conference report until he was thoroughly satisfied with the modifications of it to suit his views. That is the sole objection I ever heard to the bill from any Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. What can be the objection to allowing the concurrent resolution to pass, and let the bill come back and be considered?—because it can be considered before Congress adjourns.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is unanimous consent asked?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition before the Senate——

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to say to the Senator from Nebraska that my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is called out of the Chamber and is not here at this time, and I shall have to object myself to the resolution being taken up in his absence. So I ask that it may be passed over.

Mr. TELLER. If that is the case, I should like to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object, most decidedly.

Mr. HILL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the effect of the error of the Presiding Officer, or the error of the clerks, in not handing down the concurrent resolution as a part of the morning business? Will it not come up to-morrow morning?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. It will.

Mr. COCKRELL. It ought to.

Mr. HILL. I want a ruling to that effect, and then we will decide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the concurrent resolution will come up regularly to-morrow morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it come up to-morrow morning, just as it ought to have come up this morning.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will say frankly that if the Senator from Nebraska will ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be treated as a part of the morning business to-morrow, personally I will not object, and I do not think any other Senator will object, under the circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There can not be any objection, inasmuch as the resolution has not been submitted to the Senate as a part of the morning business.

Mr. FAULKNER. If there is not consent, the resolution will go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is entitled to its day. The Chair understands that the request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution is denied. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I have been yielding. I do not want to interfere if the concurrent resolution can be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to ask the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from New Hampshire, in view of the fact that there was a clerical error in not laying the resolution before the Senate this morning, to allow it to be corrected now, so that the RECORD shall show the passage of the concurrent instead of the Senate resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. We must object to that. We have no objection to the resolution coming up when we are present. It came up this morning when every member of the committee was absent. I have no objection to its being considered to-morrow morning.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand the Senator objects to the resolution, however.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall oppose it with all the power I have.

Mr. ALLEN. No doubt.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not much, but all I have.

Mr. ALLEN. Doubtless, if the Senator uses all his power, the resolution will be defeated.

Mr. GALLINGER. That depends upon circumstances.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BROWN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit to the Senator from Missouri that it will take ten minutes to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE. We will take a recess at 6 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 7.30 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 7.30 p. m.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 8623) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to define the jurisdiction of the police court of the District of Columbia."

Mr. PEFFER. That is not a pension bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. When the order was made, I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, an agreement was entered into that no other business but action upon unobjected pension bills would be done during this half hour.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should be happy to yield, of course; but that agreement was made on the floor at the suggestion of several Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). Under the unanimous agreement entered into this afternoon, unobjected pension bills on the Calendar will now be considered, and the Secretary will read the first bill.

MALACHI SALTERS.

The bill (H. R. 9319) granting a pension to Malachi Salters was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Malachi Salters, late a sergeant of Company F, Ninth Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, upon the pension roll of the United States, and to grant him a pension of $50 a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNIE FOWLER.

"SEC. 4. That in all cases tried before said court the judgment of the court shall be final, except as hereinafter provided. If, upon the trial of any such cause, an exception be taken by or on behalf of the United States, the District of Columbia, or any defendant to any ruling or instruction of the court upon matter of law, the same shall be reduced to writing and stated in a bill of exceptions, with so much of the evidence as may be material to the question or questions raised, which said bill of exceptions shall be settled and signed by the judge within such time as may be prescribed by rules and regulations which shall be made by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia for the transaction of business to be brought before it under this act, and for the time and method of the entry of appeals, and for giving notice of writs of error thereto from the police court of the District of Columbia; and if, upon presentation to any justice of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia of a verified petition setting forth the matter or matters so excepted to, such justice shall be of opinion that the same ought to be reviewed, he may allow a writ of error in the cause, which shall issue out of the said court of appeals, addressed to the judge of the police court, who shall forthwith send up the information filed in the cause and a transcript of the record therein, certified under the seal of said court, to said court of appeals for review and such action as the law may require, which record shall be filed in said court of appeals within such time as may be prescribed by the court of appeals, as hereinbefore provided.

MEMORIAL MUSEUM.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the consent of the Senator in charge of the Indian appropriation bill now pending to enter a motion requesting the return of a certain bill from the House of Representatives. I will not take up the time now to explain the matter, but I give notice that I will move that the Senate request the House of Representatives to return to this body Senate bill 3608. I will call up the motion afterwards for action.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the title of the bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. That compels a little explanation. I am sure the Senate did not fully understand the purport of the bill. It gives away a portion of the Washington Monument Lot. Nothing on earth is good enough to come into the ground which is dedicated to that magnificent monument, the admiration of the world. The Washington Monument Lot is not mentioned in the bill, but the description will show that it takes a piece, about an acre, out of the lot.

Now, we decided long ago that we would erect no more buildings on the reservations in this city. Senators who have been here for some time will remember the prolonged discussions that arose over the location of the Congressional Library. Many Congressmen desired to place the building upon some one of the reservations, saying we had public land enough; that we were under no necessity of buying other land. The better sentiment of Congress prevailed, and the Library is where it ought to be, as every man of taste will say, a very noble adornment of this city and an honor to the nation.

I then said, and others said, that we never, never would consent to an encroachment of any sort upon these reservations. If we continue this, we shall have, perhaps, in the Washington Monument Lot buildings used for honorable purposes like this one, but they will be of incongruous architecture—a village of incongruous architecture—and posterity will curse us for the mauling and mangling of the noble plan of this grand city.

So, while I am perfectly willing to vote for any necessary appropriation or be taxed personally to buy any other piece of ground to obtain a suitable site for the noble purpose of the bill, I still adhere to my views—no buildings on the reservations, and, above all things, no building on the Washington Monument Grounds. No man shall exceed me in profound admiration and respect for the Daughters of the Revolution. They are doing a noble work, reviving not only intellectual creeds of patriotism, but a blessed sentimental love of country.

They shall have a museum and a good place for it; we will buy them any proper location, but I do beg the Senate to say that it shall not be on the Washington Monument Lot. That is the purport of Senate bill 3608. I do not think Senators knew it. I doubt if there has been a meeting of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds this winter. I have consulted three gentlemen on that committee, and they never knew of the bill at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator to request unanimous consent to move the recall of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will be glad to do so. I will do so at this moment, if Senators say so.

Mr. TELLER (to Mr. HAWLEY). Do it now.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate request the House of Representatives to return Senate bill 3608.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the House of Representatives be requested to return Senate bill 3608, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill setting apart a plot of public ground in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia for memorial purposes under the auspices of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I demand the regular order.

Mr. QUAY. I wish to have passed a bill to correct the military record of a soldier. It will not take half a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania provided the bill leads to no discussion, but not after this.

Mr. QUAY. Certainly it will not lead to discussion. It is merely a bill to complete a military record. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6417) to complete the military record of Caleb L. Jackson.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to remove the charge of desertion standing against Caleb L. Jackson as a member of Company D, One hundred and forty-sixth Regiment of New York Volunteers, and provides that it shall be held and considered that the said Jackson died on or about the 4th day of June, 1863, while in the military service of the United States, and on account of disability incurred in such service and in line of duty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. BRICE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

Mr. BRICE. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from South Dakota——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from South Dakota consent that I may ask for the present consideration of Senate bill 588, for the relief of William H. Hugo?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from South Dakota has just declined to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PALMER. But I still hope the Senator from South Dakota will yield to me, on account of the peculiar merit of this claim.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I insist upon the regular order. We could spend the entire evening in calling up bills from the Calendar, but I should like to dispose of the Indian appropriation bill to-night.

Mr. ALLISON. We must dispose of it to-night.

Mr. PALMER. I understand the Senator from South Dakota declines to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota insists upon the regular order.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10002) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations inserting the matter on page 57 of the bill. Is the Senate ready for the question? [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. VILAS. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BROWN. I ask that the amendment be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 20, page 57, before the word "jurisdiction," strike out the words "full and exclusive;" so as to read:

That the United States courts in said Territory shall have jurisdiction, etc.

Mr. BROWN. The pending question is on the adoption of that amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the adoption of the amendment just stated.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I had the floor when the Senate went into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. TELLER. I do not intend to make any lengthy remarks. I called attention to the fact that the Senate had sent a committee to the Indian Territory some three years ago, and the committee made a report to the Senate of the condition of affairs in the Indian Territory. I judge from the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] that he never read that report, because he seems to think that if we take from these Indians the right to hold their own court we shall be doing them some injustice and that it will be against their will.

There is in no country that I know of a civil condition like that in the Indian Territory. Perhaps there is no community in the world where so few, in proportion to the whole number, control and manage the affairs of the nation or community as in the Indian Territory. The great body of the Indian people have no voice or lot, so to speak, in the management of its affairs. Its political affairs are controlled by a few; they have the advantage of all the wealth of the nation; and the courts instituted many years ago by the Indian community, and to which they are entitled if we maintain the strict letter of the treaty, I have no doubt are not such courts as civilization and commerce and trade require.

The committee that went from this body to the Indian Territory took especial pains to look into the condition of the Indian judiciary, and I think I state it mildly when I say that perhaps in no community in the world are there more inefficient courts than there. I do not believe I should overstate it if I should say that in no community in the world are there courts so corrupt as those in that country. Numbers of citizens of that Territory came to us and presented cases of their individual experience in those courts. I recall a good many of them, but I recall one in particular, which I think I may mention.

A reputable man in the Territory came and told us that he had a contest as to his right to the possession of certain lands. He went into court as the plaintiff. After he had got into court, the judge sent him a note saying that if he would pay him $300 he would give him the decision. The case was to be tried by a jury. The jury was called, and the foreman of the jury, not intending that the judge should have much advantage of him in the way of a financial transaction, sent a note to the plaintiff's counsel, telling him that for $40 he would give him the verdict of the jury. This citizen, thinking that that was not the proper way to secure justice, declined to make the arrangement. He found the jury against him, and of course he was defeated.

Mr. PLATT. And, Mr. President, the result of that lawsuit is that a white man who by marrying an Indian wife has become an Indian, owns a town of 2,000 inhabitants.

Mr. VILAS. On what evidence is such a statement as that made about a court or a jury? Is there any testimony about it; has there been any trial of it?

Mr. TELLER. I have been stating what a citizen told us.

Mr. VILAS. Oh, yes.

Mr. PLATT. It is notorious there, and there is not any question about it.

Mr. TELLER. That is not the only instance where similar occurrences have taken place. I have been at a trial in the woods where one of these courts was in session, where a man was being tried for his life. I do not know what the methods were; but it seemed to be generally understood around there that the man was in no possible danger, because his friends were there with a sufficiency of currency to see that he was not convicted. Possibly that statement was not true, but the air was absolutely full of such talk. At any rate, the man got off. I listened to the testimony, and I doubt very much whether he would have gotten off in any other community; but he did get off there. It seems to be a common thing for people there to say, "Oh, he will not be convicted, because Mr. So-and-so is here, who will see that he is not convicted." That is the condition all over that country. I do not mean, of course, to say that every judge does that; but a great many of them do it.

I repeat, a great number of Indians came to us and said: "Above all things we want an opportunity, if we have a contest about property, to go into the United States court." I have no doubt that if the matter could be submitted to the Indians who would act independently, a great majority of them would be delighted to have the opportunity of having the security and certainty of justice which they would get in the United States courts.

Now, why should the Senator from Wisconsin complain? I said, when I opened my remarks before the recess, that we are under obligation to give to the Indians a decent government. We have the power to legislate for them absolutely. I know we have made a number of treaties with them, and that some of them may stand in the way; but a treaty, after all, is but a statute, it is but a law, and there is no more crime in abrogating a treaty by law than there is in the repealing of a statute. It depends, of course, upon what the character of the repealing statute may be.

So far as the people's property rights are concerned, we have no power to take away any such rights; but when it comes to a question of political rights, we are as absolute over them as we are over the citizens of this District; we are as absolute as any State legislature over the political affairs of a State; and if a member of a legislature should get up and insist that they had enacted a law on a certain subject heretofore, and that a bill pending proposed to repeal it, and that that was a great crime, he would not be any further out of the way than is the Senator from Wisconsin when he treats this transaction as a violation of a treaty.

We have made innumerable treaties with these Indians which it is neither to their interest nor to ours should be maintained, and we have not attempted to maintain them. If we found it to our interest, we would see that the treaties were not maintained, and if they found it to their interest, they would see that they were not maintained.

We stipulated that they might go to and remain in that Territory in isolation; we agreed to protect them in that isolation; that they should remain there by themselves, subject only to their own law, without interference by anybody. Mr. President, it was the Indians themselves who made that condition impossible of execution on our part.

I was told recently by a man who is an Indian—although nobody would know it to look at him; but he is an Indian in law—that in some neighborhoods there are ten white men to one Indian; but I believe from my observation, and the best information I can gather, taking the whole Indian Territory, there are five white men to one Indian.

Those white men went there by the invitation of the Indians; they are not there in violation of our treaties, because we were only to remove such persons as the Indians insisted should not go into that country; but the Indians took them in, invited them there, and they are the people who have made that country worth living in.

Of course we have taken jurisdiction of all the white men, and we have established courts; but still one Indian may bring another Indian into these corrupt, incompetent courts, where there is neither protection for person or property, and where, if they get justice at all, they are compelled in a great many cases, if not in a majority of cases, to buy it. There is no use of mincing words about this subject. There is not on the face of the green earth, in my judgment, a country where there is more corruption than there is in that Territory in their legislative affairs and in their judicial affairs.

It is incumbent upon us to see that they have honest and capable courts, and no one should say that is a hardship when we say that every controversy, whether it arises between an Indian and an Indian or an Indian and a white man, or between white men and white men, should be submitted to the Federal courts. Those courts have always been of the very highest possible character; and I believe I may say that the courts there now and the United States judges there now are men of the highest character, and nobody complains that there is any want of protection to life, liberty, and property in those courts.

When the Senator from Wisconsin gets up here and tells us that the pending proposition is a violation of the treaties, I say it is not a violation of the treaties. It may be that we may abrogate a treaty, but if we do, we do it in a constitutional and legal manner. The Senator is a lawyer, and ought to distinguish between a violation of a treaty and the abrogation of a treaty. There never was a treaty made where the right was not reserved by the party making it to abrogate it whenever the conditions required it. There never was a treaty made between two nations where there was not a reserved power of abrogation, and that will always be the case. That will be the case with a treaty of arbitration or anything else, and especially, as suggested to me by a Senator on my left [Mr. DAVIS], for a breach of it. The Indians have failed to keep the provisions of the treaty on their part.

Mr. VILAS. In what respect?

Mr. TELLER. In the respect that they have covenanted with us that they would maintain a decent government there. They have not done so. If the Senator will look over the treaty, he will find that those Indians have agreed to maintain a government to give protection to all classes, and they have not had such a condition there for many years.

Mr. President, I shall not attempt to detail the condition there. Senators know something about it. There is not any community in the United States in any such condition, and no such condition has ever elsewhere existed. The crime, the murder, theft, and other things that are going on there are beyond comparison with any other community that has ever existed on this continent. I do not mean to bring an accusation against all those people. There are a great many people down there who are good people, and they are Indians, too; but they are not those who are standing with the Senator from Wisconsin to-day. They are the men who want to see the strong hand of the Government put out.

We paid those people immense sums of money. We paid it to them upon the theory that every Indian there participated with every other Indian; that all men stood alike. There can be no complaint of the want of benevolence and generosity on the part of the United States, because we paid them more than their lands were worth. That should be divided among them per capita. When our committee were there Indians would appeal to us, and say, "If any more money is to be paid to us, do not let it be paid through the nation; see that it is paid through a United States officer, for that is the only way that we shall ever get it."

Mr. President, I could take an hour to detail the methods by which they swindle the poor Indians, who live in the bush and the brush, as they were detailed to us not by the Indians themselves, not so much by those who had suffered, for they were too ignorant to do that; but many of them who had stood by and looked on knew there was no method of redress save through the strong hand of the United States.

Whatever may be said about our treatment of the Indians, we have dealt with the Indians in the Indian Territory most munificently and magnificently. We bought them out in Mississippi and Georgia in 1828, 1829, or 1830; we commenced negotiations with them, and paid them immense sums of money. Considering at the time the poverty of the American people, the sums were immense. We moved them out to that country and gave it to them. I do not know how much right we had to do that; I believe we took it away from one tribe of Indians, perhaps, to give it to another; but we gave them that land to which they had no claim, or we paid them immense sums of money, and have been paying them immense sums of money since.

A few years ago we paid the residue of it; and for their title, which was disputed by a great many, we paid immense sums. We have treated them in such a way that no complaint ought to be made; and now we say to them, "We intend that every Indian in that Territory shall have the same right with every other Indian." We find, however, that one man has got three or four farms, another man has got a hundred, another man has got fifty; and we say, "You are not carrying out the purpose for which you were put upon this land; you are not giving to all the tribes the benefit of this great fund." We might say to them, "You have stolen most of the money paid into the hands of your rulers; you have not stolen the land, but you have stolen the usufruct of it."

I know they told me that one Indian had 150 farms rented out, while there were plenty of Indians living along the streams cultivating an acre or two of land. I found one man there who, I was told, had an income of $20,000 a year. He is an Indian under the law, but he is a white man in fact. He became an Indian under the law by marrying an Indian woman—a white woman who had married an Indian, and thus became an Indian under the law, and when her first husband died, she married this white man, and then he became an Indian. He had an income, we were told, from the town in which he had settled, of $20,000, and yet he had not a drop of Indian blood in his veins, nor had his wife, from whom he had derived this great advantage. That man is one of those who are talking about the great crime of removing people from the protection of Indian law, and putting them under the protection of the laws of the United States.

We passed on the railroad through a community where the country was settled, and I think upon every quarter section was a farm. In going miles there was not an Indian to be seen, but the whole community was a white settlement, and every white settler in the entire community for more than twenty miles was paying tribute to a single man, a white man who had married an Indian woman.

Mr. President, that is the condition all over that country, and those are the men who can induce some people who are friendly and kindly disposed toward the Indians, but ignorant of the true condition, to protest against any legislation that shall take from them their ill-gotten gains and the lands to which they are not entitled and divide them amongst the Indians.

That is all that is proposed by this amendment. First, we say we will give to the Indians the protection of the Federal courts. I do not see how any American citizen can complain of that. Nobody can pretend anywhere that the Indian will derive any more benefit from his Indian court than he will from a white man's court. Nobody can suppose, and nobody can believe, that the Indian will be better off. Shall we allow them to continue this system of jurisprudence simply because we have made a contract with them that they should have their own courts? Mr. President, such contracts, if made, had better be abrogated than kept.

That is all that has been attempted. The Committee on Indian Affairs of this body have carefully examined this proposed legislation. Senators who, like the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], live on the border of that country, who have been familiar with it for twenty or thirty years, and all the people, I believe, who live in that section on both sides of the Territory, who have as much interest and as much attachment for the Indians as anybody who lives in any other section of the country, favor such legislation. I will say here that the best friends of the Indian are found amongst the people who live in his neighborhood and by the side of him. They are the men who know his weaknesses and his wants; they are the people who are ready to help him and lift him up. There is no antagonism felt for him by them. They know what is good for him.

We have to-day heard the Senator from Missouri, who has had large experience with these people, discuss this matter; and I do not think he has said anything about the condition of that country compared with what he might have said. It is a little difficult for one to come here and make these charges; but we might as well understand the truth about the matter.

The time has come when this condition must be changed, when there must be protection to life and property in that Territory; and the first step toward it is to give those people courts; to make a place where every Indian, whenever he thinks his interests are being intrenched upon, may go and have redress. We want to open the United States courts to every Indian who may think he is being imposed upon by others. That is all there is of it, Mr. President; and if the Senator from Wisconsin had, as the Senator from Connecticut, the Senator from South Dakota, and myself, spent a week there and found the facts, and when we came back and made a report as mildly as we could consistently with the truth, I am sure he would not feel that it was incumbent upon him to stand here as the defender of a system which is a stench in the nostrils not only of the white man, but of the Indian.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that it is necessary to discuss the theory of the power of abrogating treaties, as stated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. It ought, it seems to me, as he has stated it, to have a considerable limitation. But it seems to me that these Indian treaties are very different things from ordinary treaties with entirely independent nations. They are like the promise made by a father to his son, or by a guardian to an insane ward or a spendthrift ward.

Mr. TELLER. Or a minor.

Mr. HOAR. Or a minor ward. Now, after a bargain is made, the father is bound by his honor and good faith and duty, of course, to keep his promise, in substance, and he has no right to break it for his own advantage and for the sake of getting something for himself; but, after all, he is the representative of the boy's interest, and not the boy. Now, if a father promises a son that, if he will attain a certain rank at school, he shall spend his vacation in New York, and it turns out that there is a pestilence in New York, is he obliged to keep that promise? Or suppose he finds that the boy has contracted bad habits which would make it perdition to him to be allowed some indulgence the father has promised him, some luxury which his doctor has said would be ruinous to the boy's health, should the father keep such a promise? He must, from the necessity of the case, be the representative and the judge of both sides.

Now, we are the supreme legislator for the Indian; we must be, and if we agree that an Indian shall have courts of his own, or a legislature of his own, or have certain indulgences which belong to civilized man, and it turns out in experience that keeping that promise in its letter is the ruin of the Indian himself, we are discharged from our obligation.

I will go as far as my honorable friend the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] in saying that it would be base and wicked, after we have got Indian lands, or any other thing which was Indian property, or after we had settled with them a claim which was doubtful, upon the consideration that we would do something for them in the way of paying them money or anything else, to break that promise for our own purposes. And I do not understand that the Senator from Colorado, or any other member of this committee, differs from the Senator from Wisconsin on that proposition.

Mr. TELLER. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. But they say that, having undertaken to give the Indians this kind of autonomy, legislative and judicial, it has turned out that the Indian is being ruined by it. You might just as well do as our ancestors would have done if they had been making a bargain with them. Suppose that we passed a law one hundred years ago that we would give a tribe of Indians 100 hogsheads of rum a year forever, and it turned out that we have thereby created a nation of drunkards, who are getting delirium tremens whenever that gift was carried out, would we not consider it a duty to repeal that law?

This account of the state of things in the Indian Territory does not come from the class of persons who, whether justly or unjustly, are charged with being greedy for Indian lands. This pitiful picture comes from men who have endured obloquy and opposition as the humane and disinterested friends of the Indian.

Take my late colleague, Mr. Dawes. Mr. President, there is not an example in our recent public life of a statesman who deserves the honor and gratitude of the American people, and especially of the Indian, as he does. He came into this body a great political leader. He had led the House of Representatives through the stormiest and most difficult period of its recent history, perhaps of its entire history, with a vigor and a power that none of the great leaders of that time surpassed or hardly equaled. He came in here and, laying aside very largely the ordinary object of ambition and of political desire, which would have given him a fame and political power which human nature likes to enjoy, he devoted himself to a thorough and intelligent study of the Indian problem.

Wherever there was an attempt to do a wrong to a poor Indian, you found him at the Department of the Interior or at the Indian Office or on his feet in the Senate protesting. He spent his summers in visiting those countries and in studying that problem, and there are few of the philanthropists among mankind who deserve a crown of laurels for their disinterested, faithful, wise, and honest work more than he. Now he comes back with a picture, which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] confirms.

I cite these names, Mr. President, rather than those of the Western Senators, because of the imputation sometimes cast upon some persons in that part of the country of an indifference to Indian rights, and it turns out that here are those wards of ours that we are to legislate for, in which the United States is, in keeping the word of promise to the ear, breaking it to the hope.

When we said we would give them an Indian court did we promise to give them what is no court, but a corrupt partisan on the bench, bribed and bought? That is not keeping a treaty; that is not doing the duty of a guardian; that is not doing the duty of a legislator; that is not doing the duty of a friend.

Mr. President, suppose we had not any treaty, and that there were Indians for whom we were legislating, and they had property, and they were using their property in this way, or it was being taken from them by leeches and bloodsuckers. We should not have a right to take that property from them and put it in the United States Treasury for the benefit of the people, but it would be our duty to take it from them and put it into the hands of some other guardianship than their own. Now, this treaty right being respected to its full extent is nothing but protecting the property of these wards, and when we enact that that property shall be secured and protected by the best tribunal we can devise, we are keeping the treaty, and we are keeping it for their benefit and not for ours.

So I expect to follow the humane Senator from Connecticut; I expect to follow the experience of the Senator from Colorado, who has had something to do with the administration of such things in executive as well as legislative capacity, in removing from these courts what has been described, the correctness of which description no one can contest, and providing two courts composed of men whom we know we can trust.

Mr. STEWART. I have just a word to say in regard to this matter. We entered into a treaty with these Indians that they should have Indian courts. They were separated from the whites and lived in a tribal relation. They have no Indian courts; they have no possibility of Indian courts. There are, as stated in these reports, at least five white men to one pure-blooded Indian. Now, will anybody say that where there are only one-fifth of them pure-blood Indians they can have Indian courts? By inviting the whites in there they have wholly incapacitated themselves to hold courts at all. They do not have any control over the courts. The white influence is entirely predominant, and while there are a great many good, honest people there, as there are everywhere, there are a great many who have gone there and married Indian women for the purpose of what they could make out of it.

The description of these courts and of the condition there, as given in the Dawes report and in the report of our own Senators, is such, it seems to me, that if anybody will read it carefully, will listen to it, he will see that the whole purpose of the treaty is gone; that the Indians are not capable of carrying out their part of it, and establishing and maintaining Indian courts, because they are but a remnant of the population. They have no power there at all. That condition of things having taken place, they being unable and being insufficient in number to maintain courts or laws, it seems to me it is the duty, under the treaty, for the United States to give them courts, and to give them honest courts, because there is in the proper sense no Indian rule there at all.

It is the rule of the white man, and the white man must necessarily be governed by law, or he will not be a good citizen. We all know that. He must be restrained. A few of the leading Indians, very few, and a great number of whites who have gone there as adventurers have control of this government, and the whole purpose of the treaty is subverted. If we carry out that treaty in its spirit, we will establish courts and give the Indians the benefit of the law which the treaty contemplated.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the debate upon this amendment may be continued under the five-minute rule until the vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the debate upon the pending amendment shall proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. VILAS. I wish to make some observations.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will modify my request. I ask unanimous consent that after the Senator from Wisconsin shall have concluded his remarks, the five-minute rule shall be applied to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VILAS. I do not know of any other Senator who wishes to speak on it.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] asked why I should complain, and he spoke once or twice as if in making the remarks I made I were merely echoing the complaint of some of the Indian people whose rights are to be rudely trampled upon. I have not spoken to one of them on the subject. I have never discussed the question concerning their rights in this matter with one of those people or given any heed to them. I do not make a personal complaint. I presume nothing that can be said will now stay the action of the Senate as nothing heretofore has ever stayed the action of the Senate in dealing with these Indian people, but I do still venture to say that when the United States makes a solemn agreement it ought to keep it.

I utterly repudiate any such code of law or ethics as that laid down by the Senator from Colorado, that we are to keep a covenant so long only as it comports with our interests; that we can break treaties made with people so soon as we find that we are not deriving benefit from our engagement and they are.

The United States made a bargain with these several tribes. The Senator from Colorado says that we paid them a great deal of money. Sir, it was an insignificant sum of money. We have paid other tribes vastly greater sums since that time for their lands. But are we to break our bargain because now, sixty years afterwards, we think we paid them too much? Is our engagement dependent upon our subsequent judgment of the consideration we gave for their lands? No, sir. And precisely in the same way it seems to me we can not, as men of honor, burden it with such sweet sophistries as our friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], with all his distinguished ability, has endeavored to ingraft upon this discussion.

But when the United States bargains with a tribe of Indians that if they will surrender their homes and their lands for a new home and a patent in fee, with the right of absolute government by themselves, is the United States by and by, when greedy citizens thrust themselves unbidden upon them and have destroyed or disturbed their comfort in defiance of the engagement of the United States to protect them, to turn around and say, "We will ravish the rest from you of what is yours; we will kick our engagement under foot, not because we want it, but in tender consideration of you poor people."

Yet that very people have progressed since the time when they were given their separate government as no barbarians ever before progressed in the march toward civilization. Those people who were raw Indians when they went there established for themselves governments and courts and legislatures, and until white men came upon them, reckless of every right of theirs and greedy as devils let loose, they were making such gains that they needed no kind father's hand to spare them from themselves.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose this bargain had been made with individuals who had become insane, what would the Senator do then?

Mr. VILAS. Suppose the Senator had made a bargain with some individual person who subsequently became insane, would the Senator answer that he would not keep it?

Mr. HOAR. No. If I were the guardian, I would deal with him, an insane person, so as to see that his interests were properly dealt with. But the trouble with what the Senator from Wisconsin is talking about is that nobody proposes it.

Mr. VILAS. Nobody proposes to do anything except in the interests of the Indian, and that race of Indians, which have prospered and advanced in civilization until but a few years ago they were pointed to with pride as an evidence of what an Indian people could become, are now to be treated as unworthy of expressing an opinion about their own desires simply because we want their land.

Take the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. He says the Indians have incapacitated themselves for conducting government because they have suffered white men to come in upon them. In each one of the treaties with these people the United States solemnly promised them that they would use their whole force to prevent these intruders from coming upon them, and only so long ago as just four years, when we wanted that fine body of land known as the Outlet, we stipulated and bargained with the Cherokees and enacted into a statute that we would remove their intruders and relieve them from those persons who were crowding in upon them and denying them their rights. And one of the stipulations of the engagement was, not that the United States would tell whom it was good for them to have among them, but that they should decide, in accordance with the agreement which was made—let me read a word from it, for this was the bargain made with the Cherokee Nation when they made cession of that 6,000,000 acres—

For and in consideration of the above cession and relinquishment the United States agrees, first—

It was the prime consideration which they demanded—that all persons now resident or who may hereafter become residents in the Cherokee Nation and who are not recognized as citizens of the Cherokee Nation by the constituted authorities thereof, and who are not in the employment, etc., shall be removed in accordance with the treaty.

Sir, has ever a man been removed?

Mr. TELLER. Many of them.

Mr. VILAS. Are not the hordes in that country there in defiance of the Indian's rights?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. The intruders referred to were about 6,000 persons who claimed to be Indians. The other persons who are there are white people who do not claim to be Indians, but who have been permitted to come there by the citizens, and are not called intruders.

Mr. VILAS. Were the 6,000 removed?

Mr. PLATT. That question is practically settled. We afterwards had an appraisal of the improvements which those persons had put on their lands, and they have been paid for those improvements, and most of them have gone from the Territory.

Mr. VILAS. I only read that as a single illustration.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my honorable friend, if I am not interrupting him too much, what he proposes to do? In the first place, is the picture of these courts drawn here and drawn by Mr. Dawes in his report a true one, in his judgment? If it be true, as stated by Senators on this floor and as stated by Mr. Dawes, what does the Senator propose to do? Shall it continue? Shall the United States allow a court in which a judge gets $300 from a party for a judgment and the jurors get $40 apiece for a judgment to continue perpetually? Now, I should like to know what the Senator's view is?

Mr. VILAS. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he thinks our fathers would have established government, if in forming its institutions, they had considered a rumor that some time or other there was bribery of a jury or of a court?

Mr. HOAR. That is not a fair answer to my question.

Mr. VILAS. I think this is the third session of Congress in which I have heard this same story as the reason why we should despoil these people.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not answer my question. Does the Senator believe Mr Dawes's statement, and Mr. PLATT's statement, and Mr. TELLER'S statement on that subject? That is what I should like to know. I do not want to ask him as to the veracity of those gentlemen; but does the Senator believe they are correct in their statements?

Mr. VILAS. I have no doubt whatever——

Mr. HOAR. It is a practical question.

Mr. VILAS. That there are evils in that country which need correction?

Mr. HOAR. That is not my question. It is a very interesting matter. Have these gentlemen given us a correct picture of those courts?

Mr. VILAS. I doubt it very much.

Mr. HOAR. Well.

Mr. VILAS. Now I will state my answer, if the Senator desires.

Mr. HOAR. The next question, then, would be, if it is a correct picture, what would the Senator do about it?

Mr. VILAS. Before I undertake to throw down established institutions, contrary to our solemn engagements, I would have a thorough inquiry and a careful examination, and I would have my bill taken up as a proper measure and not jammed through on an appropriation bill. If there is any court in the Indian Territory that renders a judgment more reckless of rule and law than that such a measure as this is not general legislation upon an appropriation bill, where is the judgment?

Mr. HOAR. That is another proposition. I should like to know and I ask whether the Senator really believes that the report of the committee of this body who visited the Territory for that purpose and the report of the Dawes Commission, the official authorities visiting those Indians, is true or not; and if it be true, whether he thinks that state of things should continue. And the Senator replies by saying that he thinks the Senate did very wrong in letting this legislation in on the appropriation bill. I voted with the Senator on that.

Mr. VILAS. I understood the Senator did.

Mr. HOAR. But what I want to know, if the Senator is willing to tell me, is whether he thinks the report of the Senators and of Mr. Dawes and his Commission, as friendly a judge of the Indians as ever existed, is true? I am acting on that belief, and if it be true, then I should like to know what the Senator from Wisconsin would suggest?

Mr. VILAS. I do not think the Senator derives from that report anything but a one-sided view of the condition that exists there. Of course I am not distrusting the good faith or the veracity or the excellent judgment of those men; I know it; but they are presenting only a single side of the picture, and they are presenting it as darkly as possible, almost. On the other hand, we have such information as the Senator from Tennessee produced here to-day, statements of clergymen, statements of agents and persons of excellent character, just as much character, just as good judges, as those gentlemen, who say the Indians are doing well in many respects.

I do not doubt that there are a great many violations of law.

We do not, as I had occasion to point out a little while ago, set them a very good example of law when we trample down our own rules in order to trample them down too. I do not wonder that the Indians can not understand our methods. I remember too, sir, that with all our self-exploitation, as honest and upright man as ever was in this country, old General Harney, testified before a committee of Congress that in fifty years' service of this country in the West he had never known the Indians to be the first to break a treaty, and had never known one to be kept to them.

I will answer the Senator in another respect. I have been very desirous of having something done with the Indian Territory. I am violating no confidence and saying nothing of self-praise when I say that the very bill upon which the Dawes Commission was enacted I wrote and participated in its enactment. I have desired the success of the Dawes Commission. At the last session of Congress, after various provisions had been attempted to be made for the purpose of crowding down these Indians had been ruled out of order by the Vice-President, I offered an amendment which was adopted by the Senate to continue the Dawes Commission and making an appropriation for them, and the conference committee wrote the whole thing in there afterwards.

Now, I am not going to do more than point out the right of these people, and there I am going to leave it. I know perfectly well how fruitless it is to struggle against any combination here to obtain an end through an appropriation bill, such as we have seen manifested in this case, but I am going simply to point out the ground upon which we stand and upon which I think we have a right to expect another judgment.

Let me observe the fifth article of the treaty with the Cherokee Nation, which was made in 1835:

The United States hereby covenant and agree that the lands ceded to the Cherokee Nation in the foregoing article shall in no future time, without their consent, be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory.

Yet, although the United States gave them a perpetual covenant, it is with the understanding that they could extend to them afterwards that sort of fatherly love and care which entitled them to break up whenever the United States wanted the territory.

But they shall secure to the Cherokee Nation the right by their national councils to make and carry into effect all such laws as they may deem necessary for the government and protection of the persons and property within their own country belonging to their people or such persons as have connected themselves with them: Provided always, That they shall not be inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States and such acts of Congress as have been or may be passed regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians.

The only qualification under our laws relating to intercourse with Indians; in everything else we stipulated it should be their councils' right forever to pass. Yet, sir, this very amendment proposes to substitute courts of the United States, to disregard their laws, and to practically leave their councils without any authority whatever.

By and by, and that only thirty years ago, there was another treaty made with them. They wanted the Cherokees to do something, and they procured from the Cherokees an agreement, or made another treaty with them, in which, in article 13—

The Cherokees also agree that a court or courts may be established by the United States in said Territory, with such jurisdiction and organized in such manner as may be prescribed by law: Provided, That the judicial tribunals of the nations shall be allowed to retain exclusive jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases arising within their country in which members of the nation, by nativity or adoption, shall be the only parties, or where the cause of action shall arise in the Cherokee Nation, except as otherwise provided in this treaty.

There is the explicit provision of the treaty, which it is unnecessary that we should trample down. When the Senator asks what I would do, I have suggested by the establishment of the Dawes Commission, by the continued effort to treat with the Indians, by dealing with them honestly, that we should secure their engagement again in a fair way to exchange the present condition of things for that which we may represent and show them to be applicable. It is entirely possible there is nothing but the terrific haste of some persons to obtain their ends which is urging on this legislation.

Only within a year a very marked advance has been made by the Dawes Commission. They have agreed with these people upon the obtaining of certain steps which look to a final adjustment of the whole matter. It is reasonable to believe that we can do it, and my earnest hope and prayer have been that instead of doing this deed of wickedness and disregard of our rights we should facilitate in a reasonable and proper way the accomplishment of the object for which the Dawes Commission was established.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate. I have presented the idea I wished to present on the subject, and with that I shall leave it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I wish to reply to the Senator from Wisconsin in a single sentence. He talks about the sacredness of some treaties, to keep which is to violate every reason for which the treaty was made. As the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to-day referred to the Scriptures, I wish to answer the entire argument of the Senator from Wisconsin in a scriptural quotation:

For the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. VILAS. We ought to have on this question, I think, the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the vote will not be taken now, but that it may be deferred until to-morrow morning. ["No!" "No!"]

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). The question, I understand, is upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BROWN. I vote "yea."

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I misunderstood the question. I thought it was upon the amendment of the committee. I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin be read.

Mr. CULLOM. I think we had better start again and call the roll over. I do not think anyone knows exactly what we are voting on.

Mr. BACON. The discussion has lasted so great a length of time that we have lost sight of the precise question. I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin may be read at the desk.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the roll be called over again after the reading of the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. After the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is asked that the roll call be again commenced. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment upon which the vote is to be taken is the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee, which will now be read; and then the roll will be immediately called, as it has already been commenced. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On line 20, page 57, it is proposed to strike out the words "full and exclusive" before "jurisdiction;" so that the clause will read:

That the United States courts in said Territory shall have jurisdiction and authority to try and determine all civil causes in law and equity hereafter instituted, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PALMER. Before the call commences I should like to state——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the matter is not debatable, as the roll call had commenced and several Senators had responded to their names.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARTER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. MCBRIDE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. As my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon] is paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], by consent of the Senator from Wisconsin, I have transferred my pair to my colleague, so that we may vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MANTLE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROACH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROACH. I announced my pair, but I have the privilege of voting to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. I am informed by his colleague that if the junior Senator from Rhode Island were present he would vote as I have voted. I therefore permit my vote to stand.

Mr. PALMER (after having voted in the affirmative). I perceive that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] did not vote. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that we transfer the pairs, so that the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] will stand paired.

Mr. PALMER. That arrangement will be satisfactory. My vote will then stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—8.

Bate,	Chandler,	Palmer,	Vilas,
Brown,	Gray,	Pasco,	White.

NAYS—40.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PALMER. I rise for information having reference to this same amendment reported by the committee. I ask the attention of the Senate, and particularly of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], to that part of the amendment which commences on line 19, page 57. I want to get from him his interpretation of the language that follows. I read:

That the United States courts in said Territory shall have full and exclusive jurisdiction and authority to try and determine all civil causes in law and equity hereafter instituted—

The word "of" was inserted after the word "and," in line 22; so as to read—and of all criminal causes for the punishment of any offense committed after the passage of this act by any person in said Territory.

I wish to ask the Senator whether the purpose is to abolish all the Indian courts? As a matter of course, there can be no difference between abolishing courts in express terms or taking from them all jurisdiction. I then read further——

Mr. PETTIGREW. Shall I answer the Senator from Illinois now?

Mr. PALMER. I will at this point be glad to hear from the Senator.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state that the purpose of it is to take away the jurisdiction of the Indian courts as to all cases and offenses hereafter. It would leave those courts, however, in existence to dispose of the business on hand at the present time. But as to all new cases, all new crimes, all new offenses, from the time this bill becomes a law, the jurisdiction is placed in the United States court. That is the purpose of the committee amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I understand, then, that the purpose of the language which I have just read is to practically abolish all the Indian courts?

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is the purpose.

Mr. PALMER. And that they shall have no jurisdiction hereafter?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Hereafter.

Mr. PALMER. But that they may exercise such jurisdiction as they now have in causes pending before them?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; pending before them.

Mr. PALMER. Now, I should like information upon another point. Beginning in line 24, the amendment proceeds:

And the United States commissioners in said Territory shall have and exercise the powers and jurisdiction already conferred upon them by existing laws of the United States as respects all persons and property in said Territory; and the laws of the United States and the State of Arkansas in force in the Territory shall apply to all persons therein, irrespective of race, etc.

May I be permitted to inquire whether the commissioners appointed under existing laws have any final jurisdiction whatever?

Mr. PETTIGREW. They have.

Mr. PALMER. What is that jurisdiction?

Mr. PETTIGREW. They have the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace to try and determine civil actions where the sum involved is not greater than $100.

Mr. PALMER. Who appoints the commissioners?

Mr. PETTIGREW. They are appointed by the judges.

Mr. PALMER. By the judges?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; the same as United States court commissioners are appointed elsewhere.

Mr. HOAR. They are appointed by the courts, not the judges.

Mr. PALMER. My doubt would be whether a court can give judicial functions to its appointees. The commissioners appointed by the United States courts have no judicial powers. Although they have powers that very nearly resemble those that are judicial, I should doubt exceedingly the right of any court to create judicial officers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PALMER. I am very glad that it has. I may be permitted at least to ask a question for information.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Webster declared in the Senate a great many years ago that these provisions of the Constitution of the United States were not applicable to the Territories, and that our power of legislation in regard to the Territories was not fettered; and I think that has been the understanding ever since. Undoubtedly all the constitutional provisions which declare what is of common right, like the prohibition to try a man twice for the same offense or to take his property without due process of law, etc., will be scrupulously observed, and should be; but perhaps they would be treated as limitations on the legislative power. But the power to create judicial officers or the exercise of judicial functions by officers not appointed for life, which would not be permitted in the States, is not denied to Congress so far as it relates to a Territory. I suppose that is the well-settled law.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill to strike out the word "full," in line 20, on page 57, and insert the word "original." That will make the amendment comply more closely with the language used in the law books.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator will find that the jurisdiction of these courts is prescribed by special statute.

Mr. ALLEN. The sentence reads:

That the United States courts in said Territory shall have full and exclusive jurisdiction, etc.

The law book used the expression "original and exclusive jurisdiction." The word "full" is not equivalent to "original." I suggest that there may be some trouble in the tribunals there respecting that matter.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I move to strike out the word "full," in line 20, after the word "have," and to insert "original."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 20, page 57, after the word "have," strike out the word "full" and insert the word "original;" so as to read:

That the United States courts in said Territory shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if, since the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was adopted striking out fifteen lines on page 57, the words in line 24, page 58, and in lines 1 and 2, on page 59, ought to go out of the bill? Those words relate only to the words which were included in the amendment before it was changed by the motion of the Senator from Missouri. The first half of the sentence ought to be retained and the last member of it rejected, it seems to me.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The words the Senator refers to are, I think, the last three lines on page 58 and the first two lines on page 59.

Mr. VILAS. The last part of the last line on page 58 and the first two lines on page 59.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That simply provides, as to any one of the tribes which makes an agreement through the commission appointed to make an agreement with them, that this act shall not apply after the agreement is ratified by Congress. If we ratify an agreement which takes care of all the questions in this act——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But there is nothing that this will apply to, since the provision was stricken out on the motion of the Senator from Missouri this morning. It seems to me if it were modified so as to leave stand the words "That said commission shall continue to exercise all authority heretofore conferred on it by law to negotiate with the Five Tribes," and stop right there, it will be complete; and the other is practically inoperative on account of the amendment made to the amendment this morning.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am not so sure about that. I do not see why they could not make an agreement to change absolutely the jurisdiction of courts or substituting another court or a different court. They might make a contract with these people that we would ratify which would take that nation out of the jurisdiction of the court constituted by this act. I can see no harm in leaving the words in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota whether it is the purpose of the amendment to make the members of these tribes citizens of the United States? I find this language, commencing on page 58:

Now conferred upon them in the trial of like causes; and any citizen of any one of said tribes otherwise qualified who can speak and understand the English language may serve as a juror in any of said courts.

Is it the purpose of the amendment to limit juries to the Indian tribes, or is it meant to declare that any citizen may be a competent juror? Now, it happens in this case that there are white people in that Territory who are citizens of the United States. Would they be competent jurors?

Mr. PETTIGREW. As the law now stands, only persons who are not citizens of the tribes can act as jurors in the United States courts; but as we confer jurisdiction over citizens of these tribes, we also allow those who can speak the English language to act as jurors. That is the force and effect of the provision.

Mr. PALMER. With other citizens?

Mr. PETTIGREW. With other citizens.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask if the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] was adopted by the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was adopted as amended.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The substitute which I offered for it was adopted.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now offer an amendment to come in on page 30, at the end of line 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 30, after line 8, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior is directed to negotiate through an Indian inspector with the Allegheny and Cattaraugus Indians in the State of New York for an allotment of all the lands in their reservation to the Indians entitled thereto in severalty; and the agreement, if any, shall not be binding until approved by Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does that amendment say that they shall make their report to Congress?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It says that the agreement shall not be binding until ratified by Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let them make their report to Congress.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment should read:

The agreement, if any, shall be reported to Congress.

Mr. HOAR. I think a proper way, instead of having all these subordinates report directly to Congress, would be to provide that the agreement should be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, and then laid before Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right. Let it read:

The agreement shall be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, and by him submitted to Congress for approval or disapproval.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The amendment says it shall not be binding until ratified by Congress, and as it is made by the regular officer of the Department, an inspector, I do not see how he could report to anybody else but to the Secretary of the Interior. However, I do not object to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CALL. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is directed to negotiate through an Indian inspector with the Allegany and Cattaraugus Indians in the State of New York for an allotment of all the lands in their reservation to the Indians entitled thereto in severalty, and the agreement, if any, shall be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, and by him reported to Congress for approval or disapproval.

Mr. ALDRICH. The other language is better than the language now proposed.

Mr. CALL. I do not know anything about this amendment. There may be some discussion about it, but I have a memorial on the subject.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. CALL. I have been requested to ask the attention of the Senate to a memorial of the Seneca Indians in connection with this amendment.

I supported an amendment similar to this at the last session, in connection with the New York Senator.

I have no knowledge on the subject, and have done all that I promised to do in bringing this memorial to the notice of the Senate, without expressing any opinion on the subject.

Mr. STEWART. While the amendment is in preparation, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to call attention to this matter.

Mr. STEWART. While that amendment is in the course of preparation will the Senate receive an amendment which I offered last night?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] will be passed over temporarily, and the amendment of the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

Mr. STEWART. It is an amendment which I offered last night. An objection was then made on account of its not having been referred to a committee. That objection has now been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 67, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

To reimburse the county of Ormsby, State of Nevada, for money expended in the purchase of improvements on lands donated to the Government for an Indian school, $6,375.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I call attention to some amendments offered by me last evening, which were laid over until to-day. I desire to have them now taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Nebraska as soon as the pending amendment is disposed of.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer the amendment now in the form in which I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], as modified by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], will be again stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is directed to negotiate, through an Indian inspector, with the Allegany and Cattaraugus Indians in the State of New York for an allotment of all the lands in their reservation to the Indians entitled thereto, in severalty, and report the result to Congress, and the agreement, if any, shall not be binding until approved by Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know that I shall object to that amendment going in, because I suppose they might try the allotment plan; but I know that it does not come from the Indians. I know they do not desire any allotment, and I do not believe they ought to have it.

Mr. CALL. The purport of their memorial is that they do not desire it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN. I call for the reading of the amendment to which I referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the bottom of page 26 it is proposed to insert:

That the adult allottees of land in the Peoria and Miami Indian Reservation, in the Quapaw Indian Agency, Ind. T., who have received allotments of 200 acres each, may sell 100 acres each of said allotments and all inherited lands, on obtaining the consent of the Secretary of the Interior in each individual case, which sale shall be afterwards approved by him.

Mr. PALMER. I am opposed to that amendment. I should like to raise the point of order against it, if I can do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois raise the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. PALMER. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope my friend from Illinois will not do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will please state his point of order.

Mr. ALLEN. This is desired by the Indians themselves. They are a civilized tribe of Indians. They have 200 acres of land each, and many of them are competent and intelligent business men, and they want to sell a portion of the land. The Senator from Illinois knows very well that the Indians do not cultivate very extensive farms. This amendment proposes to permit them to sell one-half of their inheritance, providing the Secretary of the Interior, in the first instance, gives his consent to it, and then, after the contract is made, it must go back to him in each case for his approval or disapproval.

Mr. PALMER. I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is withdrawn, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANTLE. I now desire to offer an amendment moved by me last night on behalf of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which was objected to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and the point of order raised against it. I understand that the Senator from Iowa is willing to withdraw his objection and permit the amendment to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after line 3, on page 43, the following:

That there be paid to the Nsalem Band of the Tillamook tribe of Indians, of Oregon, the sum of $10,500, to be apportioned among those now living and the heirs of those who may be dead, by the Secretary of the Interior, as their respective rights may appear; and that for this purpose there be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,500: Provided, That said Indians shall accept said sum in full of all demands or claims against the United States for the lands described in said agreement made with them, dated the 6th day of August, 1851.

Mr. MANTLE. I do not care to discuss the amendment, unless some explanation is desired. As a report has been made upon the matter and printed, I presume Senators understand what the amendment is.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will ask the Senator whether the amendment contemplates the payment of the money per capita to each individual Indian, or, if to the tribe, to what authority?

Mr. MANTLE. It proposes to pay this money to the remnant of the tribe. I understand there are only about seventeen members of the tribe now living. This claim has been pending a good many years, and there is absolutely no objection to it from any official source. Upon the other hand, the claim has been recommended and its payment advocated by every Secretary of the Interior, every Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and everyone who has had anything whatever to do with it since the time the debt was contracted.

Mr. LINDSAY. I do not make the inquiry in any spirit of objection to the amendment——

Mr. MANTLE. I understand.

Mr. LINDSAY. But only to ascertain to whom this money is proposed to be paid.

Mr. MANTLE. It is proposed that the money shall be distributed per capita among the members of the tribe now living and the heirs of those who are dead. It does not appear that they have ever received a cent for the land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I call attention now to the other amendments which I offered yesterday, and which were passed over. I ask, first, action on the amendment with reference to the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, after the amendment adopted after line 3, it is proposed to insert:

That the annuities of the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians arising under the treaty of July 23, 1851, between said bands of Indians and the United States, which annuities were declared forfeited by the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians," approved February 16, 1863, be, and the same are hereby, restored and continued from the time of the last payment before said act forfeiting the same to July 1, 1902, the date of the expiration of said treaty of July 23, 1851, for which purpose a sum of money sufficient to pay said annuities is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and after deducting all sums actually paid to said Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians, by reason of said treaty of July 23, 1851, the sum remaining unpaid, after deducting and paying attorneys' fees in accordance with agreement with said Indians on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the balance shall be paid per capita to said Indians or disbursed for their benefit for such objects and purposes and in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may deem for their best interests, or deposited in the Treasury for the use and benefit of said Indians, and paid to them or expended for their benefit in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct; and on all sums remaining in the Treasury of the United States said Indians shall receive interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, said interest to be paid to them per capita on the 1st day of November of each year.

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment was read last evening, and I made the point of order against it that it was general legislation. I have since consulted with the Senator from Nebraska respecting this matter, and I have prepared an amendment in substitution of that amendment and to one other offered by him.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir; the one in reference to the Wapakootas and Medawakantons.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Nebraska will accept the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute, I will withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to report to Congress, as soon as practicable, or at its next regular session, copies of all treaties or agreements made with the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians prior to and since 1863; also a statement in detail, as far as practicable, of all amounts or sums paid to said Indians under said treaties or otherwise, including amounts for subsistence since said period; also the extent of reservations granted to them by said treaties or agreements, or any of them, and amounts now in the Treasury arising from the sale of their reservation or portions thereof; also a statement of all the appropriations made for or on their behalf since said period, or on behalf of any of them. The Secretary of the Interior shall also make a like report respecting the Santee Sioux Indians, of Nebraska, and the Flandreau Sioux Indians, of South Dakota, formerly known as and being a confederacy of the Medawakanton and Wapakoota Sioux Indians; also including any and all amounts paid to said bands, or any of them, under treaties and appropriations made since 1863 for the benefit of the Sioux of different tribes, including the Santee Sioux, of Nebraska. The Secretary of the Interior shall also embrace in his report a statement of annuities due, if any, and unpaid to said Indians prior to the passage of the forfeiture act of 1863.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa the propriety of adding to the Sissetons and Wahpetons the same language that is added to the Santee Sioux; that is, the closing portion of the amendment. One thing which I think ought to be made prominent in the report of the Secretary of the Interior is the amount of money the Government has received from the sale of these lands. To illustrate, the 320,000 acres of land in one body that the Government of the United States got from these Indians, paying, all told, 30 cents an acre for them—that is, we did not pay them 30 cents, but we agreed to pay them the interest on 30 cents—and the Government got that land and sold it for $1.25, and possibly more, an acre.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the amendment covers all the essential points.

Mr. ALLEN. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that it probably does cover them as to the Santee Sioux, but does not cover them as to the Sissetons and Wahpetons.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to ask the Senator if that is a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I supposed.

Mr. ALLISON. I propose to have this amendment placed in the bill where I have indicated, and the other amendments are to be dropped by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. All the information required is to be found in the amendment as I proposed it. I think there is no modification necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Nebraska having withdrawn his amendment, as the Chair understands.

Mr. ALLEN. I withdraw the amendment I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the Senate now to take up some of the amendments I offered last evening, and which were laid over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, after line 4, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall, through an officer of the Government, disburse $300,000 of the money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Creek Nation of Indians, only for the payment of the debt to the Government of the Creek Nation: Provided, That no debt shall be paid until by investigation the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that said nation of Indians incurred said debt, or issued its warrants representing the same, for a full and valuable consideration, and that there was no fraud in connection with the incurring of said debt or the issuing of warrants.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that before we adopt that amendment there ought to be some explanation by the Senator of the character of this debt. If it is simply warrants held by certain people scattered over the country, who are seeking in this manner to get the cash, the full par value, on these warrants, which probably were obtained at a great discount—of which, of course, I have no knowledge, and perhaps the Senator can correct me, if I am mistaken—anyhow, I should like to have some explanation of the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think if the Senator had listened to the reading of the amendment, he would have been satisfied that any difficulty such as he suggests is guarded against in the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I beg to assure the Senator from Arkansas that I listened to every word of the amendment. I understand this matter is to be examined into and is to be reported upon, and if it shall be found that no fraud of any kind is shown, that then it is to be paid, and it is to have the approval of the Secretary of the Interior first. I undertake to say that no fraud will be shown, that the $300,000 will be paid out if this amendment is adopted, and I should like to know something of this debt before we adopt an amendment paying this amount out of the trust fund of this Indian nation.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, the language of the amendment which I thought had possibly escaped the attention of the Senate is:

Provided, That no debt shall be paid until by investigation the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that said nation of Indians incurred said debt, or issued its warrants representing the same, for a full and valuable consideration, and that there was no fraud in connection with the incurring of said debt or the issuing of warrants.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to have the Senator read the first clause of that amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It reads:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall, through an officer of the Government, disburse $300,000 of the money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Creek Nation of Indians, only for the payment of the debt to the Government of the Creek Nation.

Mr. ALLISON. That surely should require the assent in advance of the Creek Nation to such payment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Creek Nation is asking for it. Their petition is here, presented by officers of that nation.

Mr. ALLISON. Then it should be stated in the amendment "with the consent and authority of the Creek Nation filed with the Secretary of the Interior." Is this amendment reported from any committee?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think it has not been. The matter is before the Committee on Indian Affairs, but my impression is that the amendment has not been reported. There are two agents of the Creek Nation here, accredited by the Creek council, asking that this appropriation be made. The reason they give for asking for this appropriation is that there are $103,000 outstanding of debts incurred by the nation for the building of certain schoolhouses and the establishment of certain schools; that there are outstanding $230,000 of warrants, which have been incurred in the administration of their affairs as a nation, making a total of $335,000 outstanding of the debt. They sent these two agents here from the council, authorized by the governor, asking that they be allowed to use a sufficient sum of their money in the Treasury to pay these debts. The limitations were prepared by members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, though I believe the amendment has not been voted on by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I suggest, if this amendment is to be adopted, that it provide for the assent and approval of the council of the Creek Nation, to be passed after the passage of this act and to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have no objection to the amendment. I shall be glad to have any limitation of that sort put on the payment of the money. If the Senator from Iowa will suggest the amendment that he would like to have go in, it can be inserted.

Mr. ALLISON. I would suggest to insert:

Upon the properly authenticated demand of the Creek Nation after the passage of this act.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. At the beginning of the amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. PEFFER. While the Senate is considering the phraseology of the amendment, I will take the liberty of suggesting that it would be well to have an officer appointed, either an individual or several of them, to examine into the facts and report them to Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the payment is made?

Mr. PEFFER. Before the payment is made.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. This requires that the Secretary of the Interior shall do that.

Mr. TELLER. He will provide the method.

Mr. PEFFER. Does it require him to disburse the money?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It requires him to investigate before he pays a dollar.

Mr. TELLER. And then he has to disburse it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then he has to disburse it.

Mr. WILSON. My recollection is that the Committee on Indian Affairs pretty thoroughly investigated this matter at the time when the two representatives were before the committee asking for the allowance of this money. That was some time ago. I do not recall fully all the facts, but my recollection is that from the statements made by the agent of the Indian council the appropriation did not meet with the entire approval of the Indian Affairs Committee.

Now, my objection is that we are in every Congress coming here and taking these trust funds, gradually appropriating them for this purpose and that, and if it is to continue a little longer, there will be none of them left. These people have issued a large amount of county or Territorial warrants——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. National warrants.

Mr. WILSON. Or national warrants (I do not know by what name they may be called in that country; they are the same as our county warrants in the West) and doubtless these warrants are to-day in the hands of the much-despised goldbugs. They are here in this manner and in this way seeking payment of the same. I have been greatly in hopes that the resources of that section of country, their rentals, might keep up their schools, etc., without intrenching upon their trust funds, and I regret to see an amendment of this character proposed to the Indian appropriation bill without first having received full and complete consideration and recommendation by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me ask the Senator from Washington if there is a recommendation from the Secretary of the Interior for this payment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is; and from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Arkansas for answering the question of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will withdraw what I said just now, and let the Senator from Washington answer. I do not want to interrupt.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no. The Senator from Arkansas entirely misunderstands me. If he had only waited a moment, he would have heard. I was about to say that I do not recall that there had been any such recommendation before the committee, but I do recall, I will inform the Senator from Iowa, that these two representatives appeared before the committee. The Senator was present at the time.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendment may be stated as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Upon the properly authenticated demand of the Creek Nation, made after the passage of this act, the Secretary of the Interior shall, through an officer of the Government, disburse $300,000 of the money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Creek Nation of Indians, only for the payment of the debts of the government of the Creek Nation: Provided, That no debt shall be paid until by investigation the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that said nation of Indians incurred said debt and issued its warrants representing the same for full and valuable consideration, and that there was no fraud in connection with the incurring of said debt and the issuing of warrants.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the Senate now to take up the next amendment which I offered last night.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after line 25, it is proposed to insert:

For fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Chickasaw Nation of Indians, namely, for arrears of interest, at 5 per cent per annum, from December 31, 1840, to June 30, 1860, on $184,140.09 of the trust fund of the Chickasaw Nation erroneously dropped from the books of the United States prior to December 31, 1840, and restored December 27, 1887, by the award of the Secretary of the Interior, under the fourth article of treaty of June 22, 1855; and for arrears of interest, at 5 per cent per annum, from March 11, 1850, to March 3, 1890, on $58,021.49 of the trust fund of the Chickasaw Nation erroneously dropped from the books of the United States March 11, 1850, and restored December 27, 1887, by the award of the Secretary of the Interior, under the fourth article of the treaty of June 22, 1855, $558,520.54, to be paid to the treasurer of said nation upon requisition signed by the governor and national secretary of the Chickasaw Nation, and to be immediately available.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order upon the amendment that it is not estimated for, and that it is a pure claim and an absolute gratuity. I believe it has the partial sanction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, although I am not sure about it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The amendment passed the Committee on Indian Affairs almost unanimously; possibly there may have been one or two votes against it. I am not sure about it. I think there was but one. It was reported to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. That does not make it in order.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the fact that it is an appropriation to carry out treaty stipulations with the Chickasaw Indians does make it in order.

Mr. TELLER. That is a mooted question.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will not detain the Senate at this late hour in making a statement about it further than to relate the facts, as I understand them, in a word.

Between 1830 and 1835 the Chickasaw Indians sold their lands on this side of the Mississippi River and put the money into the Treasury of the United States. They had an agreement with the Government of the United States that they should receive 5 per cent interest on that fund. In 1840 the United States erroneously used $180,000 of that fund. In 1850 it erroneously used $60,000 of that fund, and of course there was no interest paid on those items after they were taken out of the trust fund.

In 1854 there was a treaty between the Chickasaw Indians and the Government of the United States, in which, in article 4, the statement was made that the Chickasaw Indians claimed that there had been funds improperly taken out of their trust funds, and it was agreed between the parties that the Secretary of the Interior should take up and determine the question whether these sums had been improperly taken out of the trust fund, and that his finding should be final.

Now, there was no action under that agreement solemnly made between the Government of the United States and these Indians until Mr. Lamar, Secretary of the Interior, thirty years after that time, took up the question. It being an old question, it was referred to the Court of Claims to find the facts. The Court of Claims found the facts. It reported that these sums had been erroneously taken out of the funds of the Indians, and the funds were restored by act of Congress to the trust fund of the Indians. From 1887 the interest has been paid on the $180,000, and from 1889 or 1890 it has been paid on the $60,000.

The claim of the Indians is that there ought to be the same interest paid on these funds from the time they were taken out of the trust fund until they were restored that would have been paid if by the mistake or the wrongful act of the Government this money had not been taken out of their funds. That is the statement in a nutshell, as I understand it.

The Court of Claims did not undertake to pass on the question of interest. While I do not understand how it would be possible for them to have any question about the propriety of paying interest on funds taken out in this way, they said the question of the payment of interest was a matter to be settled by the legislative branch of the Government, and they left that to be determined by Congress. I believe the money is fairly and justly due these people. If we had settled this debt when the Indians insisted that it should be done—if, instead of the Secretary of the Interior failing to take up and determine this question and decide what was right between the Government and these Indians, he had done so, the interest on this fund would have been paid all along from then until now.

It seems to me the Government of the United States ought not to take advantage of the neglect of the Secretary of the Interior to take up and determine this question, the Indians being willing that the Secretary himself should render his finding and agreeing in the treaty that his finding should be final.

I have said all I care to say about it. I believe I have stated the facts fairly.

Mr. PLATT. As one member of the Indian Affairs Committee, I did not agree to report this amendment to the Senate to have it go before the Appropriations Committee and be placed on the appropriation bill. I do not think it ought to be put on the appropriation bill, because there is no time to go into the question.

Mr. CULLOM. It is merely a claim.

Mr. PLATT. There is no time to go into the history of the whole case.

It is true that there has been restored to these Indians about $240,000 through the action of the Committee on Appropriations. It took one of the findings of the Court of Claims one year, and then it was not satisfied with the other, and referred it back to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior indorsed the finding of the Court of Claims, and so it was paid through the Committee on Appropriations. But that was $240,000. Now, here is a claim for $585,000 for interest to be paid on the $240,000 principal.

Without going into the whole history of this case, which is a long and somewhat interesting one, there is one feature of it which it seems to me ought to be considered by the Senate in determining whether or not it will pay this interest. These funds were invested by the United States in State bonds, a considerable portion of them being invested in the bonds of the State of Arkansas. The United States was not bound by law or in equity or in any other way to assume the securities. The State of Arkansas and other States, the bonds of which were in this fund, defaulted, and the United States assumed the debt in order that the Indians might not suffer; and they pay a good deal more than interest by assuming the debt and the interest on the securities, being the bonds of the States which did not pay them. It seems to me that that certainly as an equitable consideration ought to come in. But I am not going to discuss the merits of this question on a point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Arkansas alludes to the fact that this payment is to be made under the fourth article of the treaty of 1854, whereby there was to be a restatement of accounts between the Indians and the Government. That restatement of accounts, although provided for in 1854 was not made until Mr. TELLER, now a member of this body, came into the Interior Department, and then he, under what is known as the Bowman Act, referred the whole question to the Court of Claims to state an account.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Secretary Lamar.

Mr. ALLISON. Secretary Teller made the submission.

Mr. PLATT. Secretary Lamar indorsed it.

Mr. ALLISON. Secretary Teller made the submission.

The Court of Claims allowed $240,000 of errors in the statement of account. In restating this account they held the Government to be bound for $50,000 paid to Hon. William M. Gwin, who at one time was a member of this body, and received under contract made with those Indians $50,000 out of that sum which he had secured for the Indians. It is shown by the testimony fairly well that these Indians made an agreement to pay him $50,000 if he would secure for them certain allowances which had been refused. The Court of Claims allowed the Indians for that $50,000 in restating the account. They alluded to the question of interest, and stated that as between individuals a restatement of account did not authorize interest upon a readjustment of items, and that the question of interest was purely an equitable one in the discretion of Congress, and in the report they allowed $240,000 in all.

When the report came to the Committee on Appropriations, we were asked to make an appropriation for that sum. We reinvestigated, so far as we could, the findings and statements and evidence before the Court of Claims, and we made up our minds that the $50,000 paid to Mr. Gwin was paid under the authority of the Indians, and that they had no right to ask the Government to reimburse them for that sum; and instead of appropriating $240,000 we appropriated $184,000. We allowed, however, a restatement of the account by the Secretary of the Interior and a reexamination of it as respects the Gwin claim. Mr. Noble, then the Secretary of the Interior, made a restatement of the account, and said upon the whole he thought it was wiser and better for the Government to pay that sum. He submitted an estimate for the amount, as Secretary Lamar had submitted an estimate for the whole amount four years before, and upon this report of Secretary Noble we appropriated the remaining $50,000.

This account covered a good many items of expenditure made by the Government under treaties for subsistence, transportation, and various things which, upon restatement, were found to be excessive. These amounts were not taken from the funds that were in the Treasury as trust funds, but they were a part of the funds authorized by treaty stipulations to be paid to these Indians for certain purposes.

After the provision for a restatement of account was put into the treaty of 1854, it lay sleeping there until 1885, apparently without any urgency as respects the restatement of account, and in 1885 this question was resurrected and submitted, and the Secretary of the Interior approved the finding of the Court of Claims and allowed them $240,000, and we appropriated the money and they have received it.

Now comes the suggestion of $585,000 of interest to be paid out of the Treasury, including interest upon the $50,000 which was paid to Mr. Gwin upon the direction certainly of the accredited agents of these Indians here in the city of Washington. I undertake to say that a more glaring gratuity was never projected into the Senate. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will request the Senator to state again the grounds on which he bases the point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. The grounds of the point of order are that, as shown by these reports and the statements, it is not under treaty stipulations, but is a gratuity to these Indians, as shown by the reports which I have on my desk; an equity about which we have absolute discretion, and that it is in the nature of a private claim of an Indian tribe. So it has no foundation whatever.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will ask the Senate to indulge me for a moment to reply to the statement made by the Senator from Iowa, as I can not agree that it shall go unchallenged in the Senate, if I understand this case.

Article 4 of the treaty of which I speak, and which the amendment proposes to carry into effect, is in these words:

> The Chickasaws allege that in the management and disbursement of their funds by the Government they have been subjected to losses and expenses which properly should be borne by the United States. With the view, therefore, of doing full justice in the premises, it is hereby agreed that there shall be, at as early a day as practicable, an account stated, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, exhibiting in detail all the moneys which from time to time have been placed in the Treasury to the credit of the Chickasaw Nation, resulting from the treaties of 1832 and 1834—

That was their trust fund—

> and all the disbursements made therefrom.

"And all the disbursements made therefrom."

> And said account, as stated, shall be submitted to the Chickasaws, who shall have the privilege, within a reasonable time, of filing exceptions thereto, and any exceptions so filed shall be referred to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall adjudicate the same according to the principles of law and equity, and his decision shall be final and conclusive on all concerned.

I will not detain the Senate by going over all the details, but I will read what the court said on the question of interest, and I will read the statement of the account as stated, and then I shall be willing for the Senate to determine whether or not it was part of the trust fund. These are the words of the court:

> In an action between individuals interest would also be allowed, for the issue presented is one of unauthorized disbursement by a trustee of trust funds expressly stipulated to be held invested in interest-bearing securities.
> We refrain, however, from expressing any opinion on this subject, as the question must necessarily be taken to the legislative department of the Government, which alone has power to grant relief, which will consider the equities of the case, and which will decide whether it is one wherein the doctrine should be waived that, as the sovereign does no wrong and is ever ready and willing to pay just debts, the Government pays no interest.

"The sovereign does no wrong," and yet by treaty stipulation we agreed (section 4 of the treaty of 1854) that the Secretary of the Interior should state this account, and still it was not done for more than thirty years. The sovereign, of course, does no wrong, but ought not to pay interest, because it was not to be blamed for that delay.

Now, the items, as stated from the office, of which this account consisted are as follows:

Chickasaw general fund—

This is from the finding of the court—

Chickasaw general fund:
Payments of transportation and demurrage to S. Buckner (charged against the trust fund prior to December 31, 1840), $58,200.

And yet the Senator from Iowa says this was not a trust fund.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I did not say that. I said it had not been placed in trust bearing interest. That fund was a part of the $6,000,000 that was used to transport these people across the Mississippi and into the Indian Territory. It was to be used for that purpose, and the remainder of it not used, as I recollect now—I do not remember the obligations of the treaty—was to be part of the trust fund.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Whatever it was, the courts said it was taken out of the trust fund, and taken out erroneously.

Payments to conductors of emigration (charged prior to December 31, 1840), $26,563.68.

The same time exactly. Now comes the other item:

Payment to assignees of William M. Gwin (charged prior to March 13, 1850), $56,021.49.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me? How could the William Gwin payment be taken out of the trust fund when William Gwin agreed to secure the placing in the trust fund of a certain amount of money? One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars was ordered to be paid to them, and he took $50,000 out of the sum before it was put into the trust fund.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The court finds that out of the Chickasaw general fund these three items were taken. It mentions the Gwin payment among the others. Out of the incompetent fund the other item, $99,000, was taken.

We had agreed by treaty stipulation to pay the interest on this money. I admit that the sovereign ought not to do any wrong; but I believe as firmly as I believe that I am living that the Government is under every moral obligation on earth to pay interest on every dollar of this money that went into the trust fund of these Indians, and was misappropriated. Would not the interest have been paid if the money had remained in the trust fund? Will anybody pretend to deny it? We paid interest on it before it was taken out. We have paid interest since it was put back. Why not pay interest in the interim? Why not pay interest for all that time?

The Senator complains that this amounts to $500,000. Whose fault is that? If the Secretary of the Interior had made the restatement in 1854, when it should have been made, it would have amounted to a bagatelle, but when our own neglect has allowed this to stand for more than thirty years, refusing to do justice to these people, I must think that a complaint of the amount of the interest that is due can not be charged as a fault on the part of the Indians, and it ought not to be a just ground for complaint against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Iowa to raise the point of order that this is a claim. The Chair will read the rule applicable to the case. Section 4 of Rule XVI provides that:

No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

The amendment purports on its face to be for the purpose of carrying out certain treaty stipulations with the Chickasaw Nation, but it appears from the statement of the case that has been made that the amount actually agreed to be paid under the treaty has been paid; that the amount has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior and has been paid, but that there is a claim for a still further amount of interest which has never yet been adjudicated. That being the case, it is not included in the exception to the rule. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to offer another amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after line 25, it is proposed to insert:

That the disbursing officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, directed to pay, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the trustee or legal representatives of Eli Ayres the sum of $58,158.46: Provided, That such payment when made shall operate as a final settlement in full, as between the said trustee and legal representatives of said Eli Ayres, his or their heirs or assigns, and the United States, for any claim against the United States which—

Mr. ALDRICH. This is evidently a private claim. I suggest there is no use to take the time of the Senate at this late hour by reading the whole of the amendment. The first part of it shows it to be a private claim, and subject to the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator from Rhode Island will hear it all, he may possibly know more about it; but as he seems to know what it is without reading it——

Mr. ALDRICH. The first sentence in the amendment shows that it is a private claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be unable to rule upon the amendment until it has been presented in full.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment, as follows:

Said Ayres may have had during his lifetime by reason of the fact that he purchased, and there was conveyed to him, the right and title of certain Chickasaw Indians to 124,160 acres of land in the State of Mississippi, held by such Indians under the provisions of a treaty made by the United States with the Chickasaw Nation of Indians on the 24th day of May, 1834, and which said lands so purchased by said Ayres were appropriated and disposed of by the United States; the deeds by which said Indians conveyed said lands to said Ayres to be duly surrendered upon the payment to said trustee or legal representatives of the amount herein appropriated: And provided further, That when said deeds are so surrendered to the United States, and said payment so made to the trustee or legal representatives of said Eli Ayres as aforesaid, this act shall operate to forever quiet all such land titles in the State of Mississippi heretofore and now affected by reason of the appropriation and sale or other disposition of the lands so purchased by said Ayres of said Indians, as herein set forth. The said amount of $58,158.46 is hereby made immediately available.

Mr. ALDRICH. I raise the point of order that it is a private claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to hear the Senator from Arkansas upon the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have nothing to say. I submit the amendment. To be frank about it, however, the amendment is a private claim. There is no question about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas admits the point of order. It will therefore be sustained.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 53 strike out lines 10 to 17, inclusive, and insert:

For support and education of 300 pupils at the Indian school, Salem, Oreg., at $167 per annum each, $50,100; for pay of superintendent at said school, $1,800; for the erection of a school and assembly building, and dining hall and kitchen, and other necessary buildings, $15,000; for general repairs and improvements, $5,000, for steam-heating plant, $15,000; in all $86,700.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This is a substitute for the provision now in the bill. This school has been enlarged, so that it takes a larger sum of money to manage it. The amendment is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I have the letters here, which I shall be glad to have printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letters will be printed in the RECORD, as requested, without being read, in the absence of objection.

The letters are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 18, 1897.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: My attention has been called to the needs of increased capacity for the Indian Industrial School at Salem, Oreg., and upon request of Senator MCBRIDE, from that State, I have the honor to modify my estimate of appropriations for this school. That estimate was as follows:

Support of 250 pupils	$41,750
Pay of superintendent	1,800
General repairs	5,000
Steam heat	10,000
Total	58,550

The capacity of this school is between 250 and 300 pupils, but that capacity refers almost entirely to dormitory accommodations, as the school building and dining hall are entirely inadequate for the accommodation of even 250 pupils. The total enrollment for this school for 1896 was 350 pupils. Under the present management the school has prospered to a considerable extent, and, as stated in my annual report, I am of the opinion that this school should be enlarged. It is the only nonreservation school of any size on the Pacific Coast, and being located near the Indian population of the Northwest can be filled at less expense than in the majority of instances. Climatic conditions, also, demand that there should be a large nonreservation school for the Indians of that section. Salem, by reason of its location, presents the most available point for this purpose. Superintendent Potter states that in order to increase the capacity of his school it will be necessary to give him additional buildings, and therefore desires to have a new school and assembly building, a new dining hall and kitchen, three small cottages for employees, and a shop building; all of which to be heated by steam, thus doing away with the dangerous method at present used of warming the buildings by stoves. I would therefore respectfully recommend that, in view of the circumstances, that my first estimate be changed so as to read as follows:

Support and education of 300 pupils at the Indian school, Salem, Oreg., at $167 per annum each	$50,100
Pay of superintendent at said school	1,800
For the erection of a school and assembly building, and dining hall and kitchen, and other necessary buildings	15,000
For general repairs and improvements	5,000
Steam heating plant	15,000
Total	86,900

The increase in the estimate for steam heating plant is rendered necessary on account of the additional buildings asked for, which require to be heated. By the expenditure of this additional amount, I am of the opinion that the efficiency of this school will be enhanced very largely, and that it will extend its influence throughout the Northwest. While the appropriation is only increased for 50 pupils, yet, under the economical management of the superintendent, he will unquestionably maintain a much larger number. As before stated, the utmost capacity of the school is taxed, and I am informed by the superintendent that many are therefore necessarily turned away. The improvements asked for will give the Pacific Coast a most excellent nonreservation industrial school.

Very respectfully, D. M. BROWNING, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 25, 1897.

SIR: I am in receipt of your communication of 18th instant, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and also your letter of 22d, to me, relative to an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. MCBRIDE to the bill (H. R. 10062) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes, viz: On page —, strike out the clause making appropriations for the Indian school at Salem, Oreg., and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"For support and education of 300 pupils at the Indian school, Salem, Oreg., at $167 per annum each, $50,100; for pay of superintendent at said school, $1,000; for the erection of a school and assembly building and dining hall and kitchen, and other necessary buildings, $15,000; for general repairs and improvements, $5,000; for steam-heating plant, $15,000; in all, $86,900."

In response you are informed that under date of the 18th ultimo the question of increasing the capacity of this school was submitted by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs (copy herewith), and I have had the matter under advisement, and have concluded, in view of the statements contained in the Commissioner's letter, to recommend that the proposed amendment be adopted.

Very respectfully, D. R. FRANCIS,
Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE].

Mr. COCKRELL. What does the Senator propose to strike out?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Simply a whole paragraph, and inserting what has been read.

Mr. COCKRELL. On what page?

Mr. PETTIGREW. On page 53.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 53 strike out beginning with line 10 down to and including line 17, in the following words:

For support and education of 250 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Salem, Oreg., at $167 per annum each, $41,750; for pay of superintendent at said school, $1,000; for general repairs and improvements, $5,000; for steam-heating plant, $10,000; in all, $58,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer an amendment in lieu of the one I offered last night.

The SECRETARY. After line 3, page 35, it is proposed to insert:

And nothing in section 27 of chapter 543, volume 26, of the United States Statutes at Large, pages 1038 and 1039, shall be construed to apply to any contract for services for the prosecution of any claim against the United States or the Indians named in said section, and which had been prosecuted to its final allowance by the Department before which it was prosecuted within the period stated in said contracts, and said contracts shall not be deemed or taken to have been in full force and legal effect until the date of their official approval by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the date of the approval thereof officially indorsed thereon by said Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as required by the provisions of the fourth paragraph of section 2103 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and in all such cases the Secretary of the Interior shall cause all claims for service under such agreements to be adjusted, audited, allowed, and paid out of any moneys in the Treasury belonging to the bands or tribes to which such Indians belong, and so much money as is necessary for that purpose is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the amount so paid shall be charged against any fund to the credit of said Indians, tribes, bands, or individuals, in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the amount so audited, allowed, and paid shall not exceed the sum of $44,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order upon the amendment that it is legislation.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no doubt, under the spirit of the ruling of the Chair made a few moments ago, that the amendment is subject to that objection. I am very sorry for it. It is a just amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Let them be concurred in in gross, unless certain amendments are to be reserved.

Mr. VILAS. I was going to ask for the reservation of the one amendment simply to make a remark upon it; that is all; not to take a vote.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to propose two amendments on page 71.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments indicated will be reserved.

Mr. CULLOM. My colleague proposes to offer new amendments.

Mr. PALMER. I propose to strike out the words "power to contract," etc., on page 71, line 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a committee amendment on page 71. The Senator from Illinois had better reserve that amendment and let the others be acted upon.

Mr. PALMER. I want to reserve those two amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there other amendments to be reserved?

Mr. VILAS. I should like to have, for a moment, the amendment in respect to the Uncompahgre Ute Reservation reserved. I do not intend to ask for any vote upon it, but I should like to have it reserved.

Mr. COCKRELL. Those three amendments are reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Two amendments; the one indicated by the Senator from Illinois and the one indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin will be reserved. The question is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are two exceptions. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] is now recognized with reference to the amendment which he had reserved.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to strike out on page 71 the words "power to contract through their duly authorized commissioner, agent, or attorney," and insert the words, "capacity to sue and be sued." The whole paragraph relates to the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The SECRETARY. On page 71, line 2, after the word "with," strike out the words "power to contract through their duly authorized commissioner, agent, or attorney" and insert the words "capacity to sue and be sued;" so as to read:

And the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians, for the purposes of the actions hereby authorized, shall be considered a tribe of Indians, with capacity to sue and be sued.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to insert the words "capacity to sue and be sued," so that the provision shall not be held to ratify any contract that may have been heretofore made.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. The very purpose of submitting the whole thing is that the court could try it upon the contracts which they have made. If this amendment is made, it practically nullifies the whole theory and spirit of the submission.

Mr. PALMER. I do not think so.

Mr. TELLER. Of course. We have provided in another place that they may be sued, and they are not asking to sue.

Mr. PALMER. The real effect of the language I propose to strike out would be to validate the contracts already made. I do not think it is necessary at all that those contracts should be validated. The force and effect of those contracts should be determined by the Court of Claims. I propose to amend so as to read:

And the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians, for the purposes of the actions hereby authorized, shall be considered a tribe of Indians with the capacity to sue and be sued, etc.

As it now stands, it reads:

And the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians, for the purposes of the actions hereby authorized, shall be considered a tribe of Indians, with power to contract through their duly authorized commissioner, agent, or attorney, etc.

If it is not intended to validate contracts that would otherwise be invalid, the mere capacity to sue and be sued, of a standing in the Court of Claims, would be given by the words I propose to substitute. But the effect of the words I propose to strike out would be to validate the contracts which would be involved in the very authority given to the Court of Claims to adjudicate these matters.

Mr. TELLER. It is nothing of the kind. It simply says that these people may have made contracts, and it leaves it to the court to determine whether they have made them or not. It is said that they had the power to make them. The court determines whether they have made the contracts.

Mr. PLATT. There was a question as to whether these Indians were so much a tribe that they had power to contract, and it is simply to cover that. That is the reason why it was inserted.

Mr. TELLER. It does not validate a contract.

Mr. PALMER. I do not believe a word of it. I believe that the real intent and office and effect of the words that I propose to strike out is to validate contracts. This is a matter between the United States and these claimants, and while the United States may have no power to validate contracts between private parties, it may validate contracts with itself or contracts that it is called upon to execute. I insist upon the amendment, because this will give them a standing in the court, but will determine nothing as to their rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. [Putting the question.]

Mr. PALMER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays. ["No!" "No!"] I must do it, because I insist upon the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that we may have the amendment read that the Senate is to vote upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, page 71, after the word "with," it is proposed to strike out the words "power to contract through their duly authorized commissioner, agent, or attorney," and to insert the words "capacity to sue and be sued;" so that it will read:

And the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians, for the purposes of the actions hereby authorized, shall be considered a tribe of Indians, with the capacity to sue and be sued.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the vote will be taken over again without calling for the yeas and nays. If the Senate votes on it again, perhaps it will allow the amendment to be made.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let the amendment go in.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not call for the yeas and nays, because it may delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply ask that the vote may be taken over again by a viva voce vote.

Mr. QUAY. I understand the Senator from South Dakota has accepted the amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have no objection to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not yielded to anyone. I wish to address myself to the amendment. I do not think that the yeas and nays ought to be called, because it may delay the business of the Senate. I wish that the pending bill could be disposed of to-night, but it ought to go over until to-morrow morning, because there may be some votes upon material questions.

Mr. ALLISON and others. No, no.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very good.

Mr. CULLOM. Let us have another vote on the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. TELLER. Let us take another vote on it. I do not care.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not insist upon the yeas and nays on his amendment.

Mr. TELLER. No one has insisted upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. QUAY. I wish some Senator would inform me why a vote is to be taken on an amendment which has been accepted by the Senator in charge of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Chair have an opportunity of announcing that the objection is withdrawn and the amendment has been accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state, on the question of the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois, that the Chair understands the request for the yeas and nays to be withdrawn.

Mr. PALMER. Am I correct in my understanding?

Mr. TELLER. Let the vote be taken over again.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; let the vote be again taken without the yeas and nays.

Mr. PALMER. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again put the question on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is one more amendment to receive the action of the Senate, and that is the one reserved by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] on page 66, in relation to the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. VILAS. With reference to that I only want to make one remark. We had some question the other day with respect to the quantity of minerals which had been reported by the Geological Survey, and their value, and my distinguished friend from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was of the opinion that it did not amount to much. I want to give the figures just in a moment from the special report on that subject made by the Geological Survey, and instead of elaborating, I will simply say that they sum up the amount of tons of that mineral as disclosed in six veins, which they name at 23,744,000 tons.

Mr. TELLER. That is the St. Louis property.

Mr. VILAS. No; that is in the Uncompahgre Ute Reservation.

Mr. TELLER. The St. Louis property is the only property that ever has been worked. No other has been worked.

Mr. VILAS. I am reading from what is said in the report in respect to the Uncompahgre Ute Reservation, that the amount in the six veins, which they name and of which they give a map disclosing the particular location and all, is above 23,000,000 tons.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that on the ground in dispute there never has been a location made, and there is no law to make locations. The Geological Bureau are talking about another place. They are talking about the property that is owned by the St. Louis company.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator is simply mistaken.

Mr. TELLER. I am not mistaken at all.

Mr. VILAS. Here are the maps, and here are the veins described and shown on the Uncompahgre Ute Reservation.

Mr. TELLER. The St. Louis company owns the property.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If there is that much mineral in it, it is not worth anything, for it would supply the world for thousands of years.

Mr. VILAS. The report not only shows this quantity of mineral there by the figures of the Geological Survey, each vein carefully stated in full detail—which I shall not take the time to read—but the commercial value of the mineral is set forth, showing that the present price per ton in Chicago and St. Louis is from $40 to $50, and, even with hauling it nearly 100 miles by wagon, the cost of delivering it is but about $25 to $30 a ton, which can unquestionably be immensely reduced. If we estimate it, therefore, at but $10 a ton, the value of that mineral goes above $200,000,000.

Mr. STEWART. That is only their estimate.

Mr. VILAS. Of course it is such an estimate as the Geological Survey would make from a careful examination of the veins, measuring their length and width, and the calculations they make in regard to them. Of course it is not a mineral location, and nobody pretends that it is; but this is the Geological Survey's report.

Mr. TELLER. There is no possible way for the Geological Bureau, or anyone else, to tell what is in an undeveloped region; and if they have made any statement as to quantities in a mine, it is a developed mine, for from a hole 10 feet deep nobody can tell anything about it. They are talking about a property that has been located and filed on by the parties who have gone in there; but not a single filing has been made on this land proposed to be opened, for it can not be made.

Mr. VILAS. Nobody pretends that it is a mineral location.

Mr. TELLER. Then they can make no estimate.

Mr. VILAS. Of course they can; but they can not make as complete a one as they could by digging; but they can make a very good estimate.

I do not desire to take up the time by asking for a vote, but I want to call attention to the fact that, so far from overestimating, unquestionably the value of that mineral deposit was underestimated in what I said in regard to it.

Mr. PALMER. I wish to propose a further amendment. After the word "attorney," in line 3 on page 71, in the committee amendment, I move to strike out the words:

And the operation of sections 2103 and 2104 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are otherwise hereby suspended as to said actions.

Mr. TELLER. I would say that those words were moved to be stricken out, and the amendment was voted down in the Senate, I suppose, of course, technically, the Senator can move the amendment over again, but are we to go over this fight again?

Mr. PETTIGREW. We have voted on the amendment in the Senate as well as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PALMER. I do not understand it to be so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, inserting the clause in relation to the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation in Utah, as it has been amended. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is concurred in.

Mr. TELLER. What is the amendment which the Senator from Wisconsin reserved?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments adopted with reference to the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us have the third reading of the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. HILL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will not do that, but will allow the bill to pass. It has passed every stage now except the third reading.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Illinois is entitled to be heard and to have an opportunity to offer his amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor, and will be heard.

Mr. PALMER. I move, beginning with line 3, and concluding with line 6, on page 71, to strike out the words:

And the operation of sections 2103 and 2104 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is otherwise hereby suspended as to said actions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Illinois that that amendment has already been concurred in, and that his motion comes too late.

Mr. PALMER. If it is too late, I submit; but I did not hear the question put on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the amendments made in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in in the Senate. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Illinois had intended, as he told me, to reserve this amendment to be voted on in the Senate.

Mr. PALMER. I announced my intention to do so.

Mr. CHANDLER. And this amendment reaches the whole root of this business. There is an attempt here to create contracts by law which do not otherwise exist. I submit that this amendment should be voted on.

Mr. PALMER. I gave notice of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the only way to reach the matter now is by a reconsideration, the Senate having acted.

Mr. BATE. I move a reconsideration, Mr. President.

Mr. STEWART. Let the reconsideration be had by unanimous consent.

Several SENATORS. All right.

Mr. PALMER. If that shall be agreed to, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is asked that the adoption of the amendment which appears upon pages 71, 72, and 73 be reconsidered.

Mr. TELLER. As to all those items?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is that the amendment be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment now offered by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "attorney," in line 3, on page 71, it is proposed to strike out the words:

And the operation of sections 2103 and 2104 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are otherwise hereby suspended as to said actions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs upon the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10289) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to proceed a little while with this bill to-night, not with a view of considering any controverted questions, but to make some progress with the reading of the bill; and I desire to give notice that immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to proceed with its consideration. There are very few controverted questions in this bill, and I think it will take but a short time to dispose of it. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

FUNDING OF TERRITORIAL INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. BRICE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10271) authorizing the funding of indebtedness in the Territories of the United States.

I will state, if I may, for the information of Senators, before asking for the reading of the bill, that this is a bill for extending the present law governing the refunding of bonds in the Territory of Arizona so as to include other Territories, without making any other substantial change. It is not a bill validating bonds, or a bill changing the character or status of bonds, except authorizing the refunding of bonds at a lower rate of interest in the adjoining Territories precisely as is now and has been for some years the law in the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Has the bill passed the House of Representatives?

Mr. BRICE. It has.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

Mr. BRICE. If the Senator desires any examination of the bill, I will ask that the bill be now read and shall not press its passage until the Senator has had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. THURSTON. The bill passed the other House and came to the Committee on Territories and has been very carefully amended in that committee so as to exclude the refunding of any future indebtedness, or of any indebtedness which is not interest bearing. It only extends substantially the provisions of the present laws of Arizona to the refunding of the interest-bearing indebtedness of the other Territories as they exist at the present time.

Mr. WHITE. I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the other fact, that the committee have reported in favor of eliminating section 16 of the bill, which, perhaps, would have the effect of validating certain bonds. The committee had not time to investigate it, and therefore reported in favor of eliminating that provision of the measure.

Mr. THURSTON. That is also true.

Mr. DAVIS. The committee gave particular attention to the bill, scrutinized it at several meetings, and had it examined by a subcommittee. It is an extension, almost in identical terms, to the other Territories of the act passed two years ago, I think, in regard to Arizona, which has worked extremely well. The Delegates from all the Territories were consulted; there was no objection to it, and, indeed, there was a very general desire for its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read by title for information.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 10271) authorizing the funding of indebtedness in the Territories of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill may be now proceeded with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Territories with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I am told by the Senator from Nebraska that there are several amendments to the bill. Why not consider the amendments as they are reached in the reading of the bill, and thus save an additional reading?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the amendments to the bill may be considered as they are reached. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The first amendment of the Committee on Territories was, in section 1, line 5, before the word "indebtedness," to insert "interest-bearing;" and in the same line, after the words "United States," to strike out "and such future indebtedness as may be or is now authorized by law;" so as to make the section read:

That for the purpose of liquidating and providing for the payment of the outstanding and existing interest-bearing indebtedness of the Territories of the United States the governor of each Territory, together with the Territorial auditor and Territorial secretary, and their successors in office, shall constitute a board of commissioners for the Territory in which they hold office, to be styled the "loan commissioners of the Territory," and shall have and exercise the powers and perform the duties hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 4, after the word "due," to strike out "or that is now or may be hereafter authorized by law;" in line 12, before the word "indebtedness," to insert "interest-bearing;" and in line 13, after the word "due," to strike out "or is now or may be hereafter authorized by law;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That it shall be, and it is hereby, declared the duty of the loan commissioners of each Territory to provide for the payment of the existing indebtedness of such Territory due and to become due, except such indebtedness as has been recognized or covered by reason of an act of the legislative assembly of New Mexico, approved January 28, 1867, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'Militia' and acts amendatory thereof," and for the purpose of paying, redeeming, and refunding all or any part of the principal and interest, or either, of the legal interest-bearing indebtedness hereby provided to be paid, and also that which may at any time become due, the said commissioners shall from time to time issue negotiable coupon bonds of the Territory when the same can be done in harmony with this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 6, after the word "treasurer," to insert "or have his engraved signature thereon;" so as to read:

That coupons for the interest shall be attached to each bond, so that they may be removed without injury to or mutilation of the bond.

They shall be consecutively numbered and bear the same number as of the bond to which they are attached, and shall be signed by the Territorial treasurer or have his engraved signature thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, line 15, after the word "supervisors," to insert "or commissioners;" and in line 17, after the word "supervisors," to insert "or commissioners;" so as to make the clause read:

The Territorial board of equalization, or, on the failure of said board, the Territorial auditor, shall determine the rate of tax to be levied in the different counties in the Territory to carry out the provisions of this act, and shall certify the same to the board of supervisors or commissioners in each county and to the municipal and school authorities; and the said board of supervisors, or commissioners, or authorities, are hereby directed and required to enter such rate on their assessment rolls in the same manner and with the same effect as is provided by law in relation to other Territorial, county, municipal, and school taxes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, line 27, after the word "supervisors," to insert "or commissioners;" in line 33, after the word "supervisors," to insert "or commissioners;" in line 39, before the word "county," to insert "interest-bearing;" in line 42, before the word "indebtedness," to insert "interest-bearing," and in line 43, after the word "allowed," to strike out "or that may be hereafter allowed by law;" so as to make the clause read:

The board of supervisors or commissioners of the counties, the municipal and school authorities are hereby authorized, directed, and required to report to the loan commissioners of the Territory their bonded and outstanding indebtedness; and said loan commissioners shall, on written demand of any taxpayer or holder of said indebtedness, require an official report from the board of supervisors or commissioners of counties, the municipal or school authorities, of their bonded and outstanding indebtedness; and said loan commissioners shall have the same power to enforce said order and compel the production of evidence as a court of competent jurisdiction; and said loan commissioners shall provide for the redeeming or refunding of the interest-bearing county, municipal, and school district indebtedness, and shall refund said indebtedness in the same manner as other Territorial indebtedness, and they shall issue bonds for any interest-bearing indebtedness now allowed to said county, municipality, or school district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, line 3, after the word "funded," to strike out "bearing a higher rate of interest than 4 per centum," and in line 8, before the word "bonds," to strike out "lower interest-bearing;" so as to read:

That whenever any of the holders or owners of any bonds, warrants, or other evidence of indebtedness of the kind and description in this act authorized to be funded, desire to surrender the same to the loan commissioners on or before the maturity of said indebtedness and exchange such bonds, warrants, or other evidences of indebtedness for the bonds by this act authorized to be issued, it shall be the duty of the loan commissioners to receive and cancel the indebtedness so surrendered and issue in lieu thereof to said holders or owners of said surrendered obligations 4 per cent Territorial bonds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, line 1, after the word "that," to strike out:

The provisions and requirements of this act shall apply to and be in full force and effect in all the Territories of the United States; and all outstanding bonds, warrants, and other evidences of indebtedness of said Territories, and the counties, school districts, and municipalities within said Territories heretofore authorized by legislative enactments of said Territories, or by Congress, and which said bonds, warrants, and other evidences of indebtedness have been sold, donated, or exchanged in good faith, and which are now held by innocent purchasers by purchase, donation, or exchange, shall be funded as in this act provided; and all of said bonds, warrants, and other evidences of indebtedness so authorized, issued, sold, donated, or exchanged as aforesaid are hereby confirmed, approved, and validated, and shall be funded as in this act provided.

And insert:

The United States shall in no way be liable for any of the indebtedness in this act authorized to be funded.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. That the United States shall in no way be liable for any of the indebtedness in this act authorized to be funded.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 17, line 4, after the word "eighty-six," to strike out:

Known as the Harrison Act: Provided, however, That the present existing and outstanding indebtedness, together with such warrants as may be issued for the necessary and current expenses of carrying on Territorial, county, municipal, and school governments for the year ending December 31, 1898, may also be funded and bonds issued for the redemption thereof; and thereafter no warrants, certificates, or other evidences of indebtedness shall be allowed to issue or be legal where the same is in excess of the limit prescribed by the Harrison Act.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 17. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any future increase of any indebtedness in excess of the limit prescribed by the act of Congress approved July 30, 1886.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRICE. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. THURSTON, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. WHITE were appointed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the Post-Office appropriation bill may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 10289) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I was about to move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. QUAY. I wish to suggest to the Senator, and I trust he will withdraw his motion for the purpose of permitting me to make the suggestion, that the Senate might now devote five or ten minutes to the consideration of the measure known as the Little bill, to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol.

Mr. ALLISON. I certainly have no objection if the Senator thinks he can pass the bill to-night.

Mr. QUAY. I should be very glad, if the Senate will indulge me, to call up the bill.

Mr. HILL. We last evening passed a substitute for that bill, which is a measure to provide an additional supply of pure and wholesome water for the District of Columbia. That answers the purpose.

Mr. QUAY. We can take care of the water, and the tea, too.

Mr. ALLISON. I am satisfied that it will be impossible to dispose of the bill to-night, in view of the thinness of the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. Then I give notice that I will call it up to-morrow.

Mr. HILL. I give notice that I will oppose it.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 27, 1897, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THE RECORD.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to present a privileged report.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland rises to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of the bill H. R. 4808, from the Judiciary Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, on yesterday I participated to some extent in the colloquial debate. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] laid down a certain proposition of law to which I respectfully and particularly called his attention, and I begged leave to differ with that gentleman on the principle of law as he had stated it. I had no objection to the position which the Reporter's notes as taken yesterday indicated that I had taken on the principle of law then under discussion. I supposed that the RECORD this morning would show his position and mine as taken on yesterday. I find, however, this morning that the gentleman from Illinois has seen fit to correct the RECORD in such a way as to reverse positions with me, and to put me in the position of denying a proposition of law which I consider sound.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILES. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman refers to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. I notice that he is not here. Will not the gentleman defer until the gentleman from Illinois comes in?

Mr. MILES. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I would gladly do that, except that I will be compelled to ask leave of absence on account of sickness in my family, and may be away a few days. I desire that the RECORD shall be corrected, in order that I may be put right before I shall leave. I have no disposition to insist that the motion which I shall presently make shall be acted on now, namely, that the RECORD be corrected so as to conform to the notes of the Reporter, which I have before me, and which I propose to have read. I have no objection whatever to the gentleman from Illinois correcting the RECORD so as to sustain his well-known reputation as a lawyer; but I have very serious objection to the gentleman so correcting the RECORD as to put me in a ridiculous position, and to put me before the lawyers of this House and the country in the position of denying the very proposition of law which he himself was denying. I shall, therefore, ask, Mr. Speaker, that the Reporter's notes as taken be read; that the notes as corrected by the gentleman from Illinois be read; and I shall move that the RECORD, on page 2350, containing the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, be amended so as to conform with the Reporter's notes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read as indicated by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MILES. I would like to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that, although the Reporter's notes are interlined, the Clerk will be able to read very distinctly what was said. The gentleman from Illinois being absent, I have no disposition to seek to put him in a false position. I believe he made a bad break as a lawyer, but I believe him to be a good lawyer, and a little too much of a tactician for me. I desire, Mr. Speaker, simply to put myself right; I am perfectly content, however, and want it understood that so far as I am concerned the whole matter may be stricken out, in order to protect the gentleman's reputation as a lawyer.

Mr. PAYNE. I still suggest to the gentleman to let this matter stand over until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] comes in.

Mr. MILES. This is my only opportunity.

Mr. GROUT. I understand the gentleman says it may lay over for action?

Mr. MILES. Until next week, when I expect to be here, if the gentleman considers it of sufficient importance.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] will be in in a few minutes. He is in the city, and no doubt he will be here directly.

Mr. MILES. I would like to have the Reporter's notes read. I want the Reporter's notes read without the interlineations, and then I desire that the Reporter's notes shall be read with the interlineations which were made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAY. My friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] does not claim that the sureties on a sheriff's or a marshal's bond are liable in case he makes a mistake?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I undertake to say that if an action would lie against the principal without a bond, then, in my State, if the deputy makes a false arrest his principal, the sheriff, is liable for it, and his bondsmen are liable upon an action brought against the principal, the sheriff.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What does a marshal or a sheriff give bonds for?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not against murder.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Against breach of the peace?

Mr. RAY. Against murder and against assault and battery——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. A sheriff gives bond against his illegal acts, and against the illegal acts of his deputy, and his bondsmen are liable for his acts under color of his office.

Now, allow me to state my proposition a little further. These gentlemen seem to take exception to it.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Not all of us; I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Under the law as it exists to-day the bondsmen of these officers of the courts are liable for their illegal acts. If a sheriff arrests unlawfully a constituent of mine, that constituent has a right to sue the bondsmen. But in this bill there is no such provision. And the remedy which is proposed here is a remedy without any merit whatever, because these post-office inspectors are in general men without any property. There is no method of garnisheeing the salaries paid by the Government of the United States. If, therefore, a post-office inspector is clothed with the authority proposed in this bill, there is absolutely no remedy for a man who may be unlawfully arrested by such an official. So it seems to me that if gentlemen here desire to give to post-office inspectors authority which they do not now possess, the bill ought to be elaborated so as to make these men liable for their unlawful acts. That the bill as now framed does not do this is my chief objection to its passage in its present form.

Mr. MILES. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] to maintain that the bondsmen of a sheriff or marshal or deputy marshal are responsible for any illegal acts of that officer, or does the gentleman mean to say that they are responsible only for acts necessarily incident to the discharge of the duties of the office?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I mean to say that as the bond runs, the bondsmen are liable to pay whatever judgment is rendered against the officer.

Mr. MILES. Of course; but can judgment be rendered for any unlawful act that he may commit?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I undertake to say that it can in Illinois; and such ought to be the law everywhere.

Mr. MILES. It certainly would not be good law anywhere else than in Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, I understand the law is the same in Ohio and most of the States.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] and then I wish to reserve the balance of my time. I trust the Chair will recognize, at the end of five minutes, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, some of these gentlemen have taken issue with me as to the law in this case as I have stated it. I said that any man who would read the statutes would not make the statement that some of these gentlemen have made, and I was contradicted by some of my wise friends. Now, the Congress of the United States has passed a law on this subject, and I desire to read it. Perhaps I do not understand it, but I think I do. Section 785 of the Revised Statutes of the United States reads as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAY. My friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] does not claim that the sureties on a sheriff's or a marshal's bond are liable in case he makes a mistake?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I undertake to say that if an action would lie against the principal without a bond, then, in my State, if the deputy makes a false arrest acting under the color of his official authority, his principal, the sheriff, is liable and his bondsmen are liable upon an action brought against the sheriff.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What does a marshal or a sheriff give bonds for?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not against murder.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Against breach of the peace?

Mr. RAY. Against murder and against assault and battery——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. A sheriff gives bond for the faithful discharge of his duty and that of his deputies, and his bondsmen are liable for his acts under color of his office.

Now, allow me to state my proposition a little further. These gentlemen seem to take exception to it.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Not all of us; I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Under the law as it exists to-day the bondsmen of these officers of the courts are liable for their illegal acts. So it seems to me that if gentlemen here desire to give to post-office inspectors authority which they do not now possess, the bill ought to be elaborated so as to make these men liable on good and sufficient bonds for their unlawful acts. That the bill as now framed does not do this is one of my objections to its passage in its present form.

Mr. MILES. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] to maintain that the bondsmen of a sheriff or marshal or deputy marshal are responsible for any illegal acts of that officer, or does the gentleman mean to say that they are responsible only for acts necessarily incident to the discharge of the duties of the office?

Now, the Congress of the United States has passed a law on this subject, and I desire to read it. Perhaps I do not understand it, but I think I do. Section 785 of the Revised Statutes of the United States reads as follows:

Mr. MILES. Now, Mr. Speaker, as my attention has been called to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is absent, I desire to say that if it is understood that my motion that the RECORD be corrected so as to conform to the notes of the stenographer shall remain pending, I will not insist upon its consideration at this time, but will wait until the gentleman from Illinois can have an opportunity to be heard upon it if he so desires.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland must make some motion.

Mr. MILES. I have made a motion. I have moved that the RECORD, on page 2350, containing the remarks of Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois, be so corrected as to conform to the notes of the Official Reporter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the RECORD be corrected on page 2350, in the part indicated by him, so as to conform to the notes of the stenographer. That is the motion now pending before the House.

Mr. MILES. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, in deference to the gentleman from Illinois, that my motion lie over until he can have an opportunity to be present and be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that his motion lie over subject to being called up by him; not, however, to interfere with——

Mr. MILES. I can not make any qualifications of my request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The fear of the Chair is that, as the time will be very much occupied from now until the end of the session, this matter might interfere with more urgent public business.

Mr. MILES. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for this error, and I am not content that the RECORD shall stand so that the gentleman from Illinois and I shall appear to have exchanged positions upon a legal proposition, and if I am not permitted to have the motion lie over in deference to the gentleman from Illinois, then, in deference to myself, I must insist upon its being disposed of now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair merely desired to know how long the gentleman desired to have the motion lie over.

Mr. MILES. If I can not have unanimous consent that it lie over, I shall insist upon having it disposed of some time before 3 o'clock to-day, as I shall be compelled to leave at that time.

Mr. PAYNE. If it is to go over to be called up during the day, I do not see any objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that this motion lie over for the present, to be called up at some time during the day.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CORRECTION.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the Journal. On page 5 of volume 1 of the Journal of this Congress, published a few days ago, I find that my name is omitted from the list of those who cast their votes for the honored occupant of the Speaker's chair. By reference to page 4 of the RECORD it will be seen that I did cast my vote for Hon. THOMAS B. REED for Speaker of this House, and I will add that if I had had ten votes I should have cast them all the same way.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 3547, with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I have been examining the Manual, and I think I am entitled to have consideration of House bill No. 366, which was under consideration on last suspension day. I ask the attention of the Chair to page 348 of the Manual, which says that on the third Monday of each month——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will suspend, the Chair will try to see that justice is done him.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Speaker. I trust that he will see that I do not lose any of my rights.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see that the gentleman from Massachusetts does not lose either his rights or his privileges.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE.

The bill (S. 3547) was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever after March 4, 1897, the President of the United States shall determine that the United States should be represented at any international conference called by the United States or any other country with a view to securing by international agreement a fixity of relative value between gold and silver as money by means of a common ratio between these metals, with free mintage at such ratio, he is hereby authorized to appoint five or more commissioners to such international conference; and for compensation of said commissioners, and for all reasonable expenses connected therewith, to be approved by the Secretary of State, including the proportion to be paid by the United States of the joint expenses of any such conference, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in the name of the Government of the United States, to call, in his discretion, such international conference, to assemble at such point as may be agreed upon.

Mr. McRAE, Mr. QUIGG, and Mr. DOCKERY demanded a second.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. McRAE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to submit the question to the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 3547), which has been read, with certain amendments which have been reported to the House from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and the question is upon the suspension of the rules.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It may be that there is no rule of the House and no custom that would control in the matter, but the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE], who is a member of the committee and is opposed to the principle of this proposition, as I understand, rose and demanded a second. The Chair, in his discretion, recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] as calling for a second. The effect of that recognition, under our rules, is to put the control of the time on both sides in the hands of gentlemen on the same side of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct as to the practice, but the Chair was informed, or supposed he was informed, by the gentleman from Arkansas that he was in favor of the proposition, and therefore told him that he thought he ought to recognize somebody who was opposed to it. If the Chair was mistaken in that, he will accord recognition to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was under the impression that the gentleman from Arkansas was opposed to the proposition.

The SPEAKER. Possibly the Chair misunderstood.

Mr. McRAE. I did state to the Chair that I would perhaps vote for this bill, but explained——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to have the present one disposed of.

Mr. McRAE. I stated to the Chair the exact position I occupied toward this bill. While I have no faith in the scheme proposed by the bill, I expect——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. McRAE. I expect, if we are fairly treated, and an opportunity given to explain why, to vote for it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that debate on the question is not in order at this stage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas is not debating the question. He is simply making a statement in regard to the parliamentary situation—correcting a misunderstanding that may have existed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Besides, there is already a point of order pending.

Mr. McRAE. While I am opposed, as I believe the most of the Democratic party are opposed, to this method of reaching the question, yet those of us who were members of that committee have felt that it was our duty to consent to the reporting of the bill, and perhaps we may vote for it, in order that the judgment of the people as registered in the November election in favor of an international agreement may be promptly and fairly tested. We thought that the minority in this House and the minority on the committee should at least have the right to control a part of the little time allowed, and for that purpose and for these reasons I sought recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to recognize members in accordance with a distinct understanding that a part of the time goes to one side of the question and a part to the other. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Tennessee will accord to the Chair a desire to carry out that understanding.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Unqualifiedly. I indorse the position of the Chair in this matter. I was under the impression that the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and I meant no reflection on the gentleman from New York in opposing the recognition made by the Chair. I thought the minority of the House ought to control the time in opposition to the measure. But I think the Chair is correct if the gentleman from Arkansas occupies the position which I now understand him to state that he does.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering a second as ordered?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Under the rule, if the pending motion be seconded, only twenty minutes are allowed for debate on each side. I desire, at the proper time, to move that one hour be allowed on each side. This is a very important bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. The time can only be extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I am aware of that. I desire to ask unanimous consent at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering a second as ordered?

There was no objection.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes on each side are now allowed for debate. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] is recognized to control the time in the affirmative, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] to control the time in the negative.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent (though I would prefer that the request be made by my friend from Pennsylvania) that one hour be allowed for debate on each side of this question. This is a matter of international importance. This is one of the most important bills that we have had before the House of Representatives. And I should like to occupy fifteen or twenty minutes myself. I had the honor of participating in the last international conference on this subject, and there are some questions connected with it that I should like to bring to the attention of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended so as to allow one hour on each side. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER. I object.

Mr. GROW. I hope the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] will withdraw his objection. On a question of this kind a debate of two hours is certainly not too long.

Mr. GARDNER. Upon the appeal of gentlemen around me, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection? The Chair hears none, and the time for debate is extended accordingly. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] is recognized.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent, in view of the extension of time, that the two hours shall be so divided that gentlemen represented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], who believe in the maintenance of a single gold standard, shall have one-third; gentlemen represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who believe in international bimetallism, shall have one-third, and that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] shall be permitted to control one-third of the time in behalf of those who believe in independent bimetallism.

Mr. DINGLEY. The artificial distinction which the gentleman is making can not be admitted.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course the granting of the request does not agree to the distinction.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the time be divided between those who are in favor of this bill and those who are opposed to it. That is all there is of it.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman knows very well that there are three different views in the House on this question.

Mr. MILNES. Regular order.

Mr. TERRY. Let us have a little fair play about this matter, instead of calling for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] is recognized.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, I desire to ask the Chair whether the extension of time was in addition to the twenty minutes allowed under the rule or whether it included the twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. It included the twenty minutes.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, one other question. At the time I asked for the extension, I said that I should want fifteen or twenty minutes myself.

The SPEAKER. That was not included in the request submitted by the Chair.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I hope I may have that time.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let us have the regular order, and go on with this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I know that, under the rule, the gentleman having charge of a bill, under the motion to suspend the rules, controls the twenty minutes provided for in the rules. I desire to inquire whether he will control the whole hour, under the agreement that has been made, and whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] will control the hour on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, unless some special provision is made, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] will be recognized to control the hour on the one side and the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] to control the hour on the other side.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think there ought to be some equitable disposition of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] is recognized, and the debate begins at a quarter before 1 o'clock.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill as it came from the Senate was very simple and easily understood. It provided merely for representation of the United States in any international monetary conferene that may be called, and it authorized the President of the United States to call such conference, if, in his judgment, that course seemed judicious.

The committee of the House of Representatives having charge of this bill have recommended some additional features. They propose to vest in the President not simply the power to call a conference, but to prepare for the conference, if necessary, or to substitute for it the plan of negotiation by diplomatic communication.

It is a fact, stated by our representatives at the last conference, that in that conference they were embarrassed, owing to the fact that they had not, as they expressed it, that knowledge of the autonomy and the monetary systems of the nations with which they were to confer that enabled them to formulate propositions which would be likely to be patiently and favorably considered by those nations; and it is in part in aid of a monetary conference, as preliminary thereto, that we propose to vest in the President the right to appoint special commissioners to conduct any preliminary negotiation that may be necessary and that may contribute to the success of the conference.

If in his judgment it is deemed best, if it is deemed that he can promote the purpose of the bill better by commissioning men with special qualifications to conduct diplomatic negotiations with the nations separately in lieu of a conference, this bill provides that he may do it. It simply proposes to vest in the Executive all appropriate means to attain the end which the bill has in view.

As gentlemen are aware, there is an existing law providing for the appointment of commissioners to an international conference by the Senate and the House as well as the President. This bill employs practically the same phraseology in expressing its purpose. A further amendment to the Senate bill now under consideration provides that the existing law shall be repealed, so that there shall be no question whether the proposed legislation is simply supplementary to the present law or whether by implication it repeals it. The committee say that it is prudent and proper, to avoid misunderstanding, that there should be an express repeal, and that the exclusive power of designating the representatives of this country at the international monetary conference shall be vested in the President.

Now, as to the general purpose of the bill, I do not propose in anything that I shall say to open the door for an academic discussion of the relative merits of silver and gold or of the question of a single or a double standard. That question was debated on a hundred thousand platforms throughout this country before the last election, and the verdict of the people was rendered. A fair concensus of the opinion of the voters of the country would indicate that the people of the United States are in favor of what is termed bimetallism, but they differ in the methods by which they will attain it, and the basis upon which they would have it rest.

The majority of the voters of this country have pronounced in unmistakable terms that they propose to attain it by no methods and to have it rest on no basis that shall lower the present standard of value or diminish by the hundredth part of a cent the value of a single dollar that now exists in our currency. They insist that the end in view shall be attained only with due reference to that fundamental principle, and that such end can be attained with due regard to that principle only by the concurrent agreement of the principal commercial nations of the world. We have announced a distinct purpose, a distinct pledge, if you please, that we will endeavor to promote this end by that means, and by that means simply; and the purpose of this bill is to crystallize into statutory form that express sentiment, purpose, and pledge of the American people.

Now, sir, it may be said—it frequently is said—that a conference will be but a vain and useless thing; that we have held four conferences, and that they have been failures. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that we have held four conferences, and it is true that they have not been productive of practical results; but it is also true that the last conference had so much promise of practical results that it saw fit to adjourn with a view of meeting again and continuing the investigation. It is also true, Mr. Speaker, that within the two or three years that have elapsed there has been a decided change in the condition of affairs. The popular branch of the British Parliament twice has passed resolutions favoring an international conference, and they passed them once, at least, without opposition. It is also true that the popular branch of the German legislative body has passed a resolution to a similar effect. It is also true that the French Chamber of Deputies, echoing the declarations of the minister of finance of France, has declared its purpose and its desire to promote this object.

So, sir, with the change of the control of the ministry of England, with the practical change in the zeal and earnestness, at least, of the attitude of France, with a declared interest in this matter in the legislative body of Germany, we approach another conference under entirely different circumstances from those which characterized the opening of the last. And then again, what I deem an important matter, the United States goes into that conference under an entirely different condition of affairs. It was announced in the conference of 1892, by the chairman of our delegation, that the United States then occupied simply a temporary position, prepared to travel one way or the other, as its policy and interest might dictate. The United States enters another conference now with a declaration of a positive purpose and policy. It enters that conference saying to the other nations, "We come to you in agreement substantially; we come not as suppliants, asking any special favor to ourselves, we come to stand by the commercial nations of the world upon whatever basis they may determine, and to compete with them, to struggle with them, if necessary, for our share of the space upon that platform. We come with an avowed purpose, and we ask of them, not simply as a favor to us, but as a matter of common concern, as a matter of interest to them as well as to us, to consider this great question."

I apprehend the representatives and the statement of the United States will be listened to in a manner which we have not been listened to before.

I do not undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that an international conference is bound to be a success. I do not undertake to say that it will certainly result in the attainment of the purpose stated in the first section of this bill, but I do mean to say that it may result in that conclusion; and I insist that so long as there is reasonable possibility of success we ought in good faith to the American people to make an honest and an earnest effort to attain it. I do not undertake to say that the entire purpose contemplated by this bill may be attained; but I do say that there is a strong probability that something may be done. I say that some step in advance may be taken; and if you can secure an agreement that binds the great commercial nations of the world upon any proposition that recognizes the fact that this is a question of common concern, that it ought to be dealt with as a matter of common concern by all these nations, it is a long step in advance. But, sir, whether this shall be a success or failure, whether practical results shall come from it or not, it is time that the question was settled. If it shall succeed, if beneficent results shall come to this people and to the world, we shall all be gratified. If it shall not succeed, then there will be removed from the domestic arena an important factor which now seems to enter into the solution of our currency question.

So, sir, I say we ought to proceed, we ought to sound and sound to the bottom the possibilities of some practical results from this line of action. Upon these grounds, Mr. Speaker, upon the ground that there is a possibility, that there is a reasonable probability of progress, if not the attainment of the entire purpose in view, upon the higher ground of a moral obligation arising from a distinct and positive pledge to the American people, I ask for the passage of this bill. We have made an honest promise, a deliberate promise, and a promise by and to an honest people ought to be honestly and fairly recognized, and honestly put into practical operation. [Loud applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to use the time which I would like to occupy, but which many gentlemen upon this floor also have some claim to; and I desire as far as possible to divide it in such a way as shall be fair to the various elements desiring to be heard on this question.

Mr. HARTMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Has the gentleman any information which he would be willing to give to the House as to the effect, or the probable effect, of the additional amendments which are put on the bill?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Montana, I have only to say that the amendments placed upon the bill are designed to give it greater efficiency, and in consultation—not consultation, but conversation—with various friends of the bill in the Senate, I am advised that they are regarded as valuable and important additions to the bill, which would rather tend to facilitate than to impede its passage. How much time have I occupied, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied fourteen minutes.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], who was a member of the last international monetary conference.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I shall support the Senate bill and also the amendment offered by the committee. The object of the proposed legislation is to secure, by an international monetary conference, or by diplomatic negotiations, "an international agreement establishing a fixity of relative value between gold and silver as money by means of a common ratio between those metals, with free mintage at such ratio." The bill fixes no time for the conference to be called or for the diplomatic negotiations to commence; but I have confidence that the incoming President, who is vested with such important power, will act promptly and wisely. I am in favor of the bill because I wish to do all in my power to promote bimetallism, and also because I desire to give Republicans every opportunity to comply with the pledge made in their last national platform.

The demands of commerce, agriculture, industry, and finance in the great and growing nations of the world, where progress and development, telegraphic communication, and railway facilities are so conspicuous, make it absolutely essential that there should be a currency which is safe and sound and of a common standard of value, and receivable by the people of every commercial nation on earth. That there is a growing feeling in our country in favor of an international agreement is very manifest. Both of the great political parties referred favorably to an international monetary conference in their national platforms in 1892, and in 1896 the Republican party in national convention declared:

> We are opposed to the free coinage of silver except by an international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote; and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved.

In addition to this, the President-elect, McKinley, declared in his letter of acceptance that he would use all proper means to promote an international agreement. The introduction of this bill, and its almost unanimous support in the Senate and the support it will receive in the House of Representatives, presents additional evidence that the people and their representatives are not in favor of the single gold standard, but that they earnestly desire pure and genuine bimetallism. When we add to this the fact that at the last November election six and one-half millions of voters cast their votes for a candidate for President who was in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 by the United States alone, the conviction that the people are in favor of bimetallism is clear and certain. The method of obtaining bimetallism seems to be the point of difference between the people of our country, and this is the problem which is to be solved. It is certain, however, that the last November election showed that the voters of our country were by an immense majority in favor of the concurrent use of gold and silver as a circulating medium of exchange at a fixed relative value as standard coin and legal tender. The Democratic party proposed to solve the problem by the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver by the United States alone. The Republican party opposed this proposition, and pledged its best efforts to bring about bimetallism through an agreement between our country and other leading commercial powers. I have no doubt that thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of voters in the United States voted against the Democratic candidate for President and for the Republican candidate for President because they believed an international agreement was possible, and that this could be brought about with less disturbance to business and values and less danger to existing conditions than by the independent action of the United States.

The time has now come when we have an opportunity to try to solve the problem and determine whether international bimetallism is practicable. We have reached a situation when honest, earnest efforts should be made to secure an international agreement with the great commercial nations of the world; and if success should not be attained, then we will be ready to consider some other plan. It is certain that the demand for an international monetary agreement will not cease until it is accomplished or until an earnest effort results in failure. If it succeeds, I shall rejoice and be glad that the most momentous question now engaging the attention of the civilized world has been settled. If it fails, the tendency in favor of independent action by the United States alone will be greatly strengthened.

In this connection I can not omit to speak of the distinguished Senator who, as a preliminary promoter of international bimetallism, is now in Europe. He does not seem to have been successful in England, but his earnest efforts and the generous donation of his time, and the indorsement which it is claimed is given to him by those now high in authority, or soon to be high in authority, are confessions that something is desired or needed in monetary affairs other than that we now have.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman two or three questions.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. My time is limited. Give me one of them now. I yield for one question only.

Mr. COX. Did you not state on the floor of this House that at the last international conference, of which you were a member, the trouble in reaching bimetallism by international agreement was owing to the attitude of England?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. My statement was not so broad as that. There were other causes. England has always stood like a lion in the way, obstructing movements toward international bimetallism. She is a creditor nation, and has had the single gold standard since 1816, and many believe she will never become a party to an international monetary agreement for the free coinage of gold and silver until other nations have entered into the compact and the situation compels her to such action. I hope she will join the movement after a while. I have no doubt the distinguished Senator who crossed the ocean in the interest of bimetallism found more encouragement in the Latin Union countries (France, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, and Greece) and also in Spain and Russia, where silver and gold are used in nearly equal quantities as money, than he received in England.

I believe the nations of Europe, with perhaps the exception of the Scandinavian countries (Norway, Sweden, and Denmark), will gladly meet in conference with our country. Since I had the honor of being a member of the international monetary conference which met in Brussels, Belgium, in November, 1892, I have received many letters from the delegates composing that conference. I shall briefly refer to several letters received by me during the last month from distinguished and influential persons residing in some of the great commercial nations of Europe. Alfred de Foville, director of the mints in France, in his letter dated January 13, 1897, says:

> On the 9th of December last our prime minister, Meline, said to the Chamber of Deputies, relative to the agricultural crisis: "As to the remedy, it is clearly indicated. It is to return to a state of thing which up to 1873 assured the safety of affairs—the reestablishment of a fixed relation between gold and silver."

Montefiore Levi, president of the Brussels monetary conference of 1892, and now a Belgian senator, in his letter dated January 11, 1897, says:

My firm belief is that if the United States proposes a conference it would meet with universal acceptance.

G. M. Boissevain, a delegate to the Brussels conference from the Netherlands, and the author of several important works on bimetallism, says in his letter dated January 16, 1897:

It is certain that my Government is as strongly as ever in favor of an international bimetallic arrangement, provided it can be secured on a solid basis, and in this opinion the Government is heartily supported by public opinion. I have a very strong feeling that it would be very desirable and necessary for your Government to invite a conference jointly with a European Government—let it be with France, best of all.

I have another letter, dated January 9, 1897, from one of the most prominent and influential members of Parliament in England, whose name I am not authorized to make public, who says:

It has long appeared to me that the only feasible way of bringing about an international agreement was for France and the United States to join in one at once at 15½ or 16 to 1. I look to France and the United States, by acting boldly, as the only countries fitted to move the question forward. * * * I should hope that if France and the United States agree to open their mints to silver and enter into an agreement for a term of years, England would open the Indian mints, and I believe Germany and other countries could be got to coin silver. France and the United States, with open mints in India, would be strong enough to maintain the parity. * * * When the ratio was once established, I should not despair of Germany and Russia and Austria, and even of England, ultimately joining. But two powers at least must lead the way. These powers must be France and the United States.

The suggestions of this able financier and distinguished member of Parliament are worthy of the kindest and most careful consideration. If the Latin Union countries were able under an international agreement to maintain the parity of gold and silver for many years, the question of the United States and a part of the nations of Europe entering into an agreement is well worthy of examination and consideration, especially when, as he says, Germany, Russia, and Austria, and even England, might ultimately join.

Mr. Speaker, I have been asked what international monetary conferences have accomplished. Four international monetary conferences have been held in the last thirty years. The first conference was held at the invitation of France, and met at Paris on June 17, 1867. The second conference met at the invitation of the United States at Paris, August 16, 1878. The third conference was called by France and the United States, and held in Paris in 1881. The fourth and last conference was held at Brussels in 1892. There were but nine nations represented in the conference of 1878, and thirteen nations represented in 1881. At the last conference, held in Brussels in 1892, twenty nations were represented and all the delegates were in their seats the first day the conference assembled. This showed the deep interest the nations of the world were taking in monetary questions, and that this interest had increased as the years had advanced. When the conference assembled at Brussels, the chairmen of the respective delegations, speaking for each of the twenty nations there represented, admitted that there was a serious monetary condition in Europe, and the minister of finance of Belgium, Mr. Berneart, in his address inaugurating the conference, declared that those who will find a remedy for the difficulties and perils of the actual monetary situation will certainly merit well of humanity; and Mr. Montefiore Levy, on accepting his high office as president of the conference, said with much force that the delegates had assembled to find, if it exists, a means of palliating by a more general use of silver in monetary affairs the serious inconvenience from which every civilized nation suffers to a more or less degree. I refer to these statements to show the great interest in monetary conferences and the universal admission that the monetary condition of Europe needed relief. While the monetary conferences that have been held were not successful on the main question, they made substantial progress in the development of bimetallism and helped to educate the people and open the way for that international agreement which I hope will come after a while.

I have been asked also if the prospect of success is better now than heretofore.

I believe the prospect for international bimetallism is better now than ever before. When the first conference was held, only about half of the nations of Europe participated. At the last conference all sent delegates. In the last year the French Chamber of Deputies and the German Reichstag have each declared in favor of a monetary conference, in order to secure an international agreement for the rehabilitation of silver at a common ratio with gold, and in England the House of Commons urged upon the Government the advisability of doing all in their power to secure, by international agreement, a stable monetary par of exchange between gold and silver.

The latest information I have seen on this subject is in the February number of the National Review, published in London, which contains an important review of the bimetallic situation in Europe by the several leaders of the movement in England, France, and Germany.

Dr. Edmond d'Arters, secretary of the French Bimetallic League, declared that there is no doubt that the French Government and a great majority of the French Parliament are in favor of bimetallism.

Dr. Otto Arendt, a member of the Reichstag and of the Prussian Diet, declares that only England blocks the way. Germany, he says, will participate in a conference called by any other power.

Lord Aldenham, who is a director of the Bank of England, says:

There is no doubt that France and the United States, by agreeing together, would themselves maintain a bimetallic law.

The action of legislative bodies and the declarations of prominent statesmen in the leading commercial nations of Europe show that the desire for international bimetallism is increasing.

I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the Committee on Coinage to the Senate bill which authorizes the President in his discretion to appoint one or more commissioners or envoys to such of the nations of Europe as he may designate to seek by diplomatic negotiations an international agreement for the purposes specified in the Senate bill.

The greatest obstacle encountered in all the international monetary conferences, and particularly in the Brussels conference, was that the delegates were not vested with authority to make an agreement, and were compelled to deal with important questions theoretically rather than practically. One of the chief officers of the Bimetallic League in England stated a few days ago his opposition to any conference being summoned unless an agreement has been arrived at beforehand by the countries concerned, and many prominent bimetallists in Europe have recently expressed substantially the same opinion.

If it is possible to arrive at an agreement before the conference meets, the best plan I know of is through diplomatic negotiations.

I believe gold and silver should be maintained side by side; they should be equal in purchasing power, equal in debt-paying power, equal in legal-tender quality.

The position of the United States stands recorded in the act of Congress passed by the Senate and House of Representatives and approved by the President November 1, 1893, and there is no later law on this subject. It is as follows in part:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets, and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts.

The legislation now pending is for the purpose of securing international bimetallism. The bill as amended should be passed unanimously. Let us do all that can be honorably done to secure international bimetallism, and if, after an honest, sincere effort, the great commercial nations of the world will not join us, then the brave, patriotic, self-reliant, and self-confident people of our great Republic will determine what the United States shall do alone.

Mr. Speaker, "there is a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will." Monetary problems and other problems are being solved in a way not expected by some. No longer can genuine bimetallism be opposed, as has so often been done, because of the enormous overproduction of silver. In 1890 the production of gold in the world was $118,000,000, and the production of silver about $200,000,000. In six brief years, as if the great Creator of man and of the world had interposed to answer the argument, the amount of gold annually produced in the world nearly doubled, while the amount of silver annually produced increased but little, and the Director of the Mint shows the remarkable fact that in 1896 the world's production of gold was $215,000,000 and the world's production of silver was $215,000,000, coinage value.

No longer can it be claimed that the election of a President will restore prosperity and bring every blessing to our country, for low prices, breaking banks, sheriffs' sales, armies of unemployed men and women, and the absence of a prosperity which cometh not refute the claim.

No longer can it be claimed that the per capita of money in the United States is just and sufficient, for the report of the Director of the Mint shows that in this the most progressive country on earth, surpassing all others in its agriculture, manufactures, mines, railroads, telegraphs, and enterprises of every description, all of which require large amounts of money, the per capita of money in the last quarter of a century has increased less than in any other great country in the world except France, where the per capita has for many years been a third more than in our country.

Since 1873 the per capita of money in the United States has increased $2.67, or from $21.36 to $24.03. In Great Britain it has more than doubled, having increased from $9.90 to $20.80. In Germany it has increased from $18.59 to $19.28. In Belgium the per capita has doubled, having increased from $14.44 to $28.49, and in Italy it has also doubled, having increased from $4.88 to $9.96.

No longer can it be doubted who are the heaviest losers under existing conditions. There has been a loss to the farmers of this country on their products of nearly one-half by the fall in prices since 1875. I have here an exhibit made by Mr. Barker February 6, 1897, in which he gives the estimated acreage and value of the cereal crops of the United States for 1875, 1885, and 1895 and 1896, which I will insert in the RECORD:

Cereal crops of 1896 and estimation of what their value would have been at 1895, 1885, and 1875 prices.

Crop.	Area, 1896.	Value, 1896.	What the value would have been at prices realized in—
			1895.	1885.	1875.

Wheat	34,619,000	310,603,000	241,986,810	278,082,960	386,594,230
Rye	1,831,000	9,961,000	11,592,230	10,839,530	19,902,970
Oats	27,566,000	132,485,000	161,812,420	217,220,080	299,642,420

Buckwheat	755,000	5,522,000	6,862,950	5,983,000	9,648,850
Total	149,349,000	972,069,000	1,012,501,860	1,257,594,220	1,777,117,230

Not only has the farmer lost nearly one-half of the amount he should have received on his products, but he has lost heavily in the decrease in value of his land. The census report of 1890 shows that the property, real and personal, in the United States was of the value of $65,037,091,197, and that real estate, with improvements thereon, was valued at $39,544,544,333. According to the best information obtainable, real estate has shrunk in value nearly one-third, but the indebtedness of individuals and corporations, which has been stated by unchallenged authority to be sixteen thousand millions of dollars, has not shrunk, neither has the interest been reduced.

In the light of these facts who can doubt that something is radically wrong. The consensus of opinion is that our monetary system is one of the great causes, if not the greatest cause, of reduction in values, depression in trade, and want of confidence in business circles.

Our whole monetary system should be revised. I regret that my limited time will not permit me to say more on this important subject. The important act to be performed now is to secure bimetallism by international agreement, if possible.

I wish to say in conclusion that the passage of the pending bill will attract attention all over the world, and the people of the United States will watch with the deepest interest the debates and conclusions of the conference and regard its success as the crowning glory of the nineteenth century. The commissioners who will be appointed should go abroad with the indorsement of all parties. The nations of the world should understand by the action of our Congress that we are united and in earnest, and that we desire a fair and just settlement of this question for the benefit of the people and in the interest of nations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I should like to have five minutes more to finish my remarks.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I should be glad to yield to the gentleman, but in view of the promises I have made to other gentleman I can not do so.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask, then, permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

Mr. MILES. I believe it was understood this morning that I might have an opportunity, notwithstanding this discussion, to call up again the question of privilege which I raised this morning. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is now present, and I want to allow him the opportunity which I stated I was content that he should have.

Mr. QUIGG. That does not come out of the time of this debate, I suppose?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I requested the reporters to give me the notes of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, made this morning, and was waiting for them to be written out, but I had just as soon take the matter up now, if it is the wish of the gentleman.

Mr. MILES. I have no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I ask the Reporter to allow me to take the notes of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that this be postponed until the bill under consideration is concluded.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, it was well understood this morning that I should have the opportunity which I am now insisting upon. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] was not present. I assigned as a reason that it would be important for me to leave——

Mr. DINGLEY. But can it not be postponed just as well until this bill is completed?

Mr. MILES. The gentleman was not present when I stated the reason this morning. I can not consent to that, for the reason that I shall be compelled to leave here at 3 o'clock on account of sickness in my family. It will only take a few minutes, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the statement of the gentleman from Maryland this morning, because I was not in the House. I have since conferred with him. The question that he propounded to me yesterday is as follows:

Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] to maintain that the bondsmen of a sheriff or marshal or deputy marshal are responsible for any illegal act of that officer; or does the gentleman mean to say that they are responsible only for acts necessarily incident to the discharge of the duties of the office?

This came up in a running debate, in which the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] took, as I supposed, a radical position. I did not fully understand the question of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] at the time, and supposed that his position was identical with the one taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]. My answer was:

I mean to say that as the bond runs, the bondsmen are liable to pay whatever judgment is rendered against the officer.

His rejoinder was:

Of course; but can judgment be rendered for any unlawful act that he may commit?

My answer, as taken by the Reporter, was:

I undertake to say that it can in Illinois; and such ought to be the law everywhere.

What I desired to impress upon the House yesterday was that the officer and his bondsmen were liable for his acts as such officer while done under the color of his office. When I came to look at my answer as taken by the Reporter, I thought that was not sufficiently clear, and I inserted what my understanding of the law then was and always has been, that he is liable for his acts "done under color of his office."

I inserted those words, which the gentleman complains of, because of the subsequent answer which he made.

Mr. MILES. What was that subsequent answer? The gentleman should read it, in justice to me.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The subsequent answer of the gentleman is:

Mr. MILES. It certainly would not be good law anywhere else than in Illinois.

Mr. MILES. That is, as you stated it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman's position on the law, as he stated it, was correct law, and as I have understood it, and as I supposed the House understood my position. Now, in inserting the words—

If done under color of his office—

I simply did what has been done by every member of this House in the revision of his remarks where the notes of the Reporter do not state his position as he intended to state it. I did no more than the gentleman from New York or any other member has done in doing that. I did not look at the gentleman's answer yesterday, to see whether I had misconstrued the position of the gentleman from Maryland, and did not notice it until the gentleman called my attention to it after I came in on the floor this morning.

Mr. MILES. The gentleman will admit, however, I think, that the question which I asked him clearly shows that I had a correct apprehension of what he said.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Your original question, as I understood it, and as I was seeking to state it to the House——

Mr. MILES. But you evidently misunderstood me, did you not?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes; I misunderstood your first question. So that in inserting the words—

If done under color of his office—

I simply exercised the privilege that has never been denied to any member on this floor, and that is constantly practiced by members in revising their remarks.

Mr. COLSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] be considered as most excellent lawyers. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish this House to consent to any such general proposition. I think the gentleman from Illinois is an excellent lawyer; I am only a humble member of that great profession; but in this particular instance an humble member of that profession was right, and is willing and content to insist upon the statement that he was right before this high tribunal. The gentleman from Illinois, as I now understand him, has stated to the House that he misapprehended my question, and that, therefore, he was to some extent wrong, or stated the proposition of law a little too broadly, and that he revised the Reporter's notes so as to confirm the proposition of law which I had laid down. Is that correct or not?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman does not understand me to convey the idea that I have misstated him?

Mr. MILES. I do not want to be understood in that way. I do not believe the gentleman undertook, or now undertakes, to misstate me. I accept, Mr. Speaker, in good faith, the explanation which the gentleman has made to the House, and I am content that the matter shall drop where it is. [Applause.]

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROSVENOR). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas for twenty minutes.

Mr. McRAE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. QUIGG. Does this come out of the time for debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ten minutes' time has been consumed and will not be considered as having been occupied during this debate.

Mr. QUIGG. I do not know that I understand the Chair to state that the ten minutes is to be deducted from the two hours' debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate has been suspended for five minutes. The debate will now continue for the two hours originally agreed upon.

Mr. QUIGG. Excepting the ten minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The debate will continue for the full time of two hours.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a few minutes of the time of this House in stating the reasons which impel me to give this measure my support. I voted in the committee to report this bill to the House, and I shall vote here to pass it through the House, because, in my judgment, the people of this country, and a large majority of them, too, are in favor of bimetallism, at least by and through an international agreement. If there is anything in the history of this country during the past twelve months that has been emphasized above everything else, it is that the people desire bimetallism.

When the two great political parties of this country assembled in their respective national conventions last year, each one as I read their platforms declared in favor of bimetallism. True, the Republican party only favored this condition of things through international agreement, but they pledged themselves to use their best efforts to bring about an international agreement, which should result in giving the people bimetallism. The Democratic party did not go so far as that, but considering the conditions surrounding the country and the difficulties lying in the way of international agreement, and recognizing the great necessity of early action, declared in favor of bimetallism at the ratio of 16 to 1. On these two propositions, plainly set forth, each party went to the country and something like 14,000,000 of voters attested the devotion of the people to the double standard.

Now, Mr. Speaker, certainly the Republican party can not object to this bill, which has for its object the furthering of bimetallism by international agreement, as they stand committed to that proposition; nor can the Democratic party object, because the same necessities and conditions which justified them in demanding the free coinage of silver, even at the ratio of 16 to 1, would induce them to agree to a proposition that would give them similar results by international agreement.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I favor the passage of this bill because I think if its provisions are carried out in good faith it will redound to the benefit of the people of this country. As I view the situation which confronts us to-day, I feel that the best interest of the country will be conserved by a return to the bimetallic system, and especially so if it is brought about by international agreement. Many, even of those who supported the Democratic ticket, seemed to think that the proposition to coin gold and silver alike at the ratio of 16 to 1 was an experiment more or less dangerous; but certainly no bimetallist can find any objection to the adoption of that system through the concert of the great commercial nations of the world. And these are the objects and purposes of this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who think that the provisions of this bill can not be carried out, and that the efforts we are making to-day are doomed to failure. On the contrary, I believe that the plan as outlined in this bill can be conducted to a successful termination, provided the proper effort is made to attain success. I believe that success or failure depends largely upon the incoming Administration, which will be charged with the execution of the provisions of this bill.

If an honest, earnest effort is made in that direction, then I believe success will crown the efforts of the President, and he will not have gone out of office before bimetallism by international agreement will have become an accomplished fact, or before such steps shall have been taken as will assuredly bring it about in the near future; but if he should disregard the wishes of the great body of American people, so recently expressed at the polls, and, listening to the whisperings of the small minority who believe in a single gold standard, should make no determined effort in the direction of international agreement upon this great question, then nothing will be accomplished and we had as well not pass this bill, as it is a waste of time and effort.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that there is no reason why with proper effort the objects and purposes of this bill should fail of accomplishment. Why, Mr. Speaker, ours is the most powerful nation on the face of the earth, and her influence when properly exerted is correspondingly great. Our past history affords many illustrations of this truth. Three-quarters of a century ago, when in our infancy, a President of the United States promulgated a doctrine alike startling and far-reaching in its effects. This was none other than the Monroe doctrine; and although we were weak then as compared with our present condition, all the great nations of the earth practically acquiesced in our claims thus clearly and plainly made, and to-day no principle of national law is more firmly established than the rights we then asserted.

Still more recently, and within the past few weeks, by and through the influence of this country, a treaty has been signed by the agents of the two English-speaking countries which, if formally ratified, as it doubtless will be, will make war between them a thing of the past. And when, through the same influence and the example set by these two great countries, the provisions of this treaty shall have extended to the other nations of Europe arbitration will take the place of sword and universal peace will prevail throughout the world. Then the large standing armies of Europe, which tax the resources of those great countries to their uttermost, will be disbanded and the millions of men forming them will be returned to peaceful pursuits, and, entering the various fields of industry, will contribute much toward bettering the condition of mankind and toward the material progress of the world.

If, then, our influence in all these great undertakings has been so potent among the nations of the earth, why should we fail of success in our efforts to bring about bimetallism by agreement between these nations? I see no reason, Mr. Speaker, except indifference. If we try, I believe success is possible. If we make no effort, or if the Republican party is not sincere in this matter, we will not succeed within the next four years at least. The opportunity is the Republicans, and the responsibility is likewise theirs. They have sought the former, and they can not escape the latter.

Mr. McRAE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN].

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the five minutes allotted me to address the House upon the pending measure, I desire briefly and plainly to state the position of the silver Republicans with reference to this bill. We intend to cast our votes in favor of the passage of the bill. In so doing, we desire to distinctly disavow any belief at all that there will result from its passage any international agreement for the achievement of bimetallism; and at the same time we desire to register our unqualified detestation of the idea embodied in the declaration which is made that we must have the consent of the leading commercial nations of the earth before we can legislate for ourselves. We desire to denounce that declaration of national incapacity as un-American, unpatriotic, humiliating, and degrading. We call attention to the fact that all of the international conferences which have been held in the past to achieve bimetallism have been dismal failures. We call attention further to the fact that, from the authority of the London Statist, which ought to be good authority in a gold-standard House, it appears that Great Britain enjoys an annual advantage each year in the matter of exports and imports of $345,000,000. In addition to that, she takes annually over $200,000,000 increased amount of our products in payment of interest, when the value of that property is measured by the scale of prices of 1895 as compared with the scale of 1890. Who believes that, thus enjoying an aggregate advantage of $425,000,000 per annum under the existing gold standard, Great Britain will ever consent to its surrender by an international agreement?

Again, I want it distinctly understood, Mr. Speaker, that no longer is there any opportunity to juggle with the word "bimetallism." Why? Because the word "bimetallism" does not appear in the platform at all.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HARTMAN. I decline to yield, Mr. Speaker; I have but five minutes.

The pledge of the platform says, in plain words:

> We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved.

That statement is a solemn pledge, first, to oppose free coinage except by international agreement, and second, failing in such agreement, to maintain the existing gold standard. Therefore,

Mr. Speaker, I want to impress upon this House the fact that no longer can they bring up before the American people the definition of bimetallism which was born in the mind of a distinguished Senator of the United States, and which means the maintenance of the gold standard, with silver as a subsidiary coin. That will not fulfill the pledge. An international agreement that England shall take so much silver, Germany shall take so much silver, France shall take so much silver, and that we shall have an enlarged use of silver, will not fulfill the pledge. It must be a straight, unequivocal, unqualified agreement to open the mints of the nations of the earth to the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at an established ratio, without any discrimination against either, each to be used as standard money. Mr. Speaker, we propose, as I have said, to respond to the demand of the platform and to give an opportunity to the Republican party to carry out their pledge. If they fail to carry it out, they fail to keep their promise. If they attempt to carry it out, they will fail to achieve international bimetallism.

Mr. McRAE. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that it is fair that we should be required to occupy all our time before the gentlemen on the other side say anything; but that is the condition upon which we are allowed any time at all. As I desire to occupy only five minutes, I hope the Chair will notify me when that time has expired.

The question presented to us to-day by this bill, as I understand it, is whether this House will authorize the majority party to do what it promised by its platform adopted June 18, 1896, which declares that—

> We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our Government. We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver, except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved.

Upon that platform they went to the country, with Mr. McKinley as their candidate. In opposition the Democrats, Populists, and Silverites nominated Mr. Bryan on platforms declaring for the free and independent coinage of silver. The Democratic platform is as follows:

> We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation.

These two candidates, with these two propositions, Mr. Speaker, went to the people in November last, and if the returns are to be accepted as the proper judgment of the people, a proposition we can not now dispute, a majority of the people have decided that the Republican party, at least for the next four years, shall have an opportunity to bring about international bimetallism. I do not believe that it can be done. The declarations of all the political parties and the utterances of speakers throughout the country in the last campaign show that almost all of the people, without regard to party affiliation, believe in bimetallism, and so I think that since we can not get it independently at present we ought to put no obstructions in the way of those who believe in this method of reaching the question.

The Democratic party, the minority party in this House, is willing, I think, that the Republican majority and the new Administration which is to be inaugurated next week shall be given full opportunity and power and as many methods as is possible to devise to accomplish international bimetallism, if such a thing can be done. So far as I am concerned, I want the test and trial made as promptly as possible, for it is important that something be done to relieve the people from the present strain. We all know that the country is in a desperate condition and demands the careful attention of every patriotic citizen, be he Republican, Democrat, or Populist. We know that banks and business houses are failing every day, that thousands and millions of people are out of employment. We know that all branches of business are prostrated and values are falling.

We believe that this is because of the lack of a sufficient volume of redemption or real money; and with this condition confronting us we should not hesitate to take any step or try any plan that looks toward accomplishing what is needed. While I have no faith in this method, I hope it may succeed. The gentlemen who are by the favor of the people to conduct the affairs of this Government for the next four years ought to have the hearty cooperation of all friends of silver in their efforts to establish international bimetallism, for if they fail, I want this to be the last of such efforts. When we find Germany, England, and France with one-half of the gold of the world, and the annual interest charges to them from the other part of the world absorbing all the products of the gold mines of the world, it is unreasonable to suppose that those countries will agree with the United States, a debtor country, to assist her in securing bimetallism. But if you can get it that way, do so. If you fail, the people will, I think, demand of you, four years from now, to answer why; and if you do not make an honest effort, and do not recede from the position which you took in the canvass of 1896, I believe they will do for you in 1900 what they did last year for the retiring Administration. The people of this country, with their increasing business, do not intend to continue upon the gold standard if there is any possible way by which it can be changed. This is the opportunity for the Republican idea. If it fails, as I think it will, we shall demand independent action on the part of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] has five minutes remaining.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, we have had several international conferences, and they have resulted in nothing. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] has confessed this morning that the great trouble in these conferences lies with England. Is there any man in this House who supposes that England is going to yield the great advantage which she enjoys under the existing system? Suppose, Mr. Speaker, this conference should be appointed and it should utterly fail; then I want to ask, gentlemen, what are you going to do? What kind of security are you going to get? What kind of legislation are you going to have?

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. McRAE. I yield four minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures I gave my assent to this proposition. I expect to give my assent to it again when the vote is taken. But I say now that I believe this measure to be a will-o'-the-wisp. I believe that by this bill we are undertaking to do circuitously that which we ought to do directly and which we have the power to do independently of any nation on the earth. Four conferences of the kind provided for in this bill have been held; and it has been observed, I think, that at each conference the chance of obtaining the coinage of both gold and silver upon equal terms and so as to perform equal functions is getting further away from us.

We want to increase the volume of money in this country, and we want the volume of money to keep pace with population and commerce, and we want actual money. What gives value to money? It is the demand, and it is this that gives value to any article. It is use and demand that fixes the price and value of all things. Mr. Speaker, if this country alone can furnish the demand for the quantity of silver that is produced in the world, then it can give it the highest possible value and can sustain that which is asked, namely, a parity between the two metals.

It is insisted that we must have the agreement of other nations in order to sustain the parity or value of the two metals when coined. It is asked that we have a conference of this kind in order to secure the assent of England to bimetallism, or to the free and equal use of both gold and silver in this country. Sir, for eighty years England has refused to assent to bimetallism; since 1816 she has declined to place silver and gold upon equal terms. Yet from that period up to the demonetization of silver in 1873 there was no disparity in the value of the two metals. We do not need the concurrence of England in order to establish and maintain bimetallism, nor can we get it, because she is a creditor nation and it would not be to her interest to increase the volume of money, which would be done by the free coinage of silver.

Mr. Speaker, from a partisan view, it is, of course, immaterial to me or to those on this side of the House what course may be pursued by the party which is responsible for legislation here. But I remember, and I give it as a reminder to the other side, that four years ago we had a platform declaring, as I construed it—and it was so construed all over this country—for the free coinage of silver, accompanied with a declaration about maintaining a parity between the two metals, yet when that platform came to be construed the parties then in power construed it to mean the continuation of the single gold standard. The Republican party has now been placed in charge of the affairs of the Government upon a platform declaring that they will do all that they can to promote the free coinage of silver by international agreement. Yet that platform is to-day being construed by a large and strong element of that party to mean a single gold standard. They say that at the last election the issue was drawn between the single gold standard and the free coinage of silver and gold, and that upon that issue the people have decided, and therefore the platform must be construed in the light of events subsequent to the writing of the platform, and that such events justify the conclusion that the plank in the platform means the maintenance of the present single gold standard; and by this they argue that on this question the people are evoluting, and that they will never turn back to what those gentlemen term the "barbaric" system of the use of silver.

Mr. Speaker, it is immaterial to us from a partisan standpoint what course the gentlemen on the other side may pursue; but being interested in promoting the prosperity of the country, in increasing the volume of money, in furnishing to the people that character of money which will circulate freely and equally everywhere, we demand as Democrats the free coinage of silver and gold upon equal terms—that they may both perform in this country the functions of money; and that this be done without waiting the advice, aid, or assent of any nation on earth.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. QUIGG. It does seem to me that as this debate has proceeded the Republicans of this body must feel a decided nausea at the meal which their Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have invited them to digest in this bill. They have heard from Democrats of the sort that supported the mule ticket, and from Democrats of the sort that supported the Bryan ticket, and from "Pops" of the sort that supported both tickets, that they are going to vote for this bill; and now Republicans, after having fought and won the most desperately contested campaign that this country ever saw, upon the distinct proposition that free silver was a humbug and a wrong, are asked to do something that throws a doubt upon the sincerity of their professions and tends to persuade the people that the Republican position was wrong and that free silver was right.

You can no more get away from the fact that the country will receive our vote—if to-day we pass this bill—as a concession to Bryanism any more than you can get away from the proposition that we fought and won the battle of 1896 on the gold standard; for that is how we did win it. If the Republicans who are asking us to pass this bill had had their way at St. Louis, we should have adopted a straddle platform and should have been hopelessly and deservedly defeated.

I oppose this bill, Mr. Speaker, first, because it is unnecessary as to its object; second, because it is inexpedient and unsuitable as to time and place, and third, because if any results are to follow, either upon the business of the country or upon the welfare of the Republican party, they must be distinctly dangerous.

What is the use of the bill, anyway? The President of the United States has a machine, for which we pay nearly $3,000,000 a year, by which he can conduct diplomatic negotiations. If he wants to find out the temper of any government upon any subject, all he has to do is to set in motion the machinery ordinarily and regularly provided for him, and he straightway discovers all that can be found out by any method of inquiry. Have we not proved by the results of three of these monetary conferences that the ordinary diplomatic machinery is as competent to get results as any such as is here proposed?

Why, sir, we had one conference when silver and gold were at par, and the question simply was how to keep them there. Yet it was impossible to reach an agreement. We had another when silver and gold were only at two points difference, and the question was how to bring them together just two points. But even in that condition agreement was impossible. We had a third when they were about twelve points off, and at that conference nobody so much as suggested a plan by means of which he was willing to say, on his reputation as an economist, that he thought a ratio could be established and held.

We are now invited to create another conference, and at a time when silver is not two, nor ten, nor twelve, but sixteen points away from the ratio that is proposed and intended by the advocates of this bill. The true ratio is now 32 to 1, not 16 to 1; and if we could not hold them together when they were together, and could not reconcile them when they were only two points off, or when they were only ten points off, how can it be supposed that success in this bimetallic enterprise is now possible?

Mr. LACEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. QUIGG. I should rather not be interrupted. I have only a few minutes.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] said that the reason why we failed in these previous conferences was because the Governments empowering the commissioners did not give them a free hand. Well, are your commissioners under this bill going to have a free hand? Why, you know they are not. You know, indeed, there is no way by which you can give them a free hand. You know that the Constitution of your country requires that every treaty that is entered into upon any subject shall come to one branch of this Congress to be ratified. You know that the only authority that could be given to the delegates under this bill is the same which has always been given and no more, and there is no reason to suppose that the delegates from any country will enjoy a larger liberty than ours. It is quite true that they have not had a free hand. They have always gone to the scene of a conference apologizing to one another because they knew they could not do anything, and because they knew they were not expected to do anything.

I object to this bill because it is improper. This Congress has nothing to do with the declaration at St. Louis. The persons who were elected under that platform, to whom this country gave authority under the declaration of 1896, will be in this Capitol—when? Why, in just one week from now, and yet we are told that in advance of their arrival, before they have had any opportunity to consider what policies they will pursue, we must support a bill that comes to us from a Populistic Senate, a body that has defeated every measure for the relief of the Treasury that the Republicans of this House have passed; that we must accept its construction of what our party promised at St. Louis, and with its construction tie the hands of those by whom we shall be succeeded. I say that we have no business to muss with this question at all. We should leave it to be dealt with by those who were commissioned last November. It is they who have the right to construe that verdict and to say what measures they will adopt to give it effect.

In the report which the Committee on Coinage has sent in here in advocacy of this bill they quote from the Republican platform certain observations concerning an international agreement, which are held to be a promise to do something. But there is no promise to do this thing. We did not say in that platform what we should do. We did not say we would call an international conference. We did not define by what means the agreement should be promoted. We left all such questions to be decided in the light of events. Nor did we say only that we would do something to promote international agreement. We said very much more than that, and it is to be observed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] has left out of his report all the other words, the further words, that were used at St. Louis concerning our financial position. I want to read the whole of that plank, in order that the Republicans of this body shall have it in its entirety in their minds when they vote on this proposition. Now listen to this:

> The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money. It caused the enactment of the law providing for the redemption of specie payments in 1879.

A MEMBER. Specie?

Mr. QUIGG (continuing reading)—

> Since then every dollar has been as good as gold.
> We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our country.

Does that look like any more nonsense on the subject of a conference?

> We are, therefore, opposed to the free coinage of silver, except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved. All our silver and paper currency must be maintained at a parity with gold, and we favor all measures designed to maintain inviolably the obligations of the United States and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

That is the pledge on which we defeated the combined forces of Democrats and Populists, so valiant here in support of this bill. And we won our victory, not because of what we said concerning an international agreement, but in spite of it. I oppose this bill, in the next place, because if it is going to have any results at all they are bound to be dangerous to the commercial prosperity of the country. We have to-day the same standard that we have had for twenty years. We have to-day the monetary standard under which we were doing business when the McKinley bill was in operation. We had then the highest and the greatest prosperity that this country or any other country under the sun ever enjoyed. That prosperity was interrupted by a bill that locked up the capital of the country, suspended production, and drove labor into idleness, and by propositions that were aimed, as this is aimed, at a double standard and financial confusion. Instead of giving place in our policies to any more follies of this sort, follies which have always been expensive to the Republican party, we should hold aloof from them and repress them.

I warn the Republicans of this House against any more nonsense on the subject of free silver. I warn them against any more attempts to fool the people of this country. We have always been defeated and rebuked when we have engaged in that kind of enterprises. We took on every stump the plain position that the gold standard ought to be maintained, and from that position we should not depart. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TOWNE and Mr. MILLIKEN rose.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman from Maine for a question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to ask my friend, in the first place, whether he thinks the Republican party was "fooling the people of this country" when they put in their platform the proposition that they would do all they could for international free coinage; and, in the second place, whether, when we get a ratio between gold and silver agreed to by the commercial nations of the world—and that is what the proposition is in the platform and what it means in this bill—whether that is going to interfere with the prosperity of the country; and whether the people of this country will be frightened by a bimetallic currency that is consented and agreed to by the commercial nations of the world?

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman has asked me two questions that would take at least an hour and a half adequately to answer. But I will say, in the first place, that the men to construe the platform of 1896 and to adopt the measures to give it effect are the men who were elected under it, not the men who are here now and about to go home. To the second question I answer that I do not believe, nor is there any reason why anybody should believe, that this international conference, if called, will have any better or other results than all the other international conferences have had, which is none at all; and, in the second place, that if an agreement were reached by an international conference upon any ratio whatever, I do not believe that the ratio would stay put. These are the answers. Now I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota for a question.

Mr. TOWNE. I wish the gentleman from New York would kindly state whether his construction of the platform of 1896 is that it embraces a promise to use the endeavors of the incoming Administration honestly and promptly to secure genuine free silver coinage by agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world.

Mr. QUIGG. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I shall give my answer to that question in the next Congress, and to those who were elected with me to membership in that body. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNE. Is that your answer? If you are content with it, I am, and the country will hold you to it.

Mr. QUIGG. I am absolutely content with it. How much time have I used, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twenty-two minutes remaining.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania use a portion of his time now?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, by reason of the relative production of gold and silver in the world for the last forty years, without some agreement among commercial nations for the use of silver as a money metal, the question of a standard of value in the money unit would be no longer one of bimetallism—that is, of gold and silver circulating on a parity with each other as standard money of ultimate redemption.

BIMETALLISM ONLY BY INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT.

Without such agreement the question will be simply whether the standard of value shall be gold, with silver circulating in subsidiary coin, or whether the standard shall be silver alone, without any gold in circulation as money.

For more than five hundred years in all nations it has been a conceded fact, which Sir Thomas Gresham, master of the British mint under Queen Elizabeth, formulated about 1560 in the following words, known since that time as Gresham's law:

When two sorts of coin are current in the same nation of like value by denomination, but not intrinsically, that is, in market value, that which has the least value will be current, and the other as much as possible will be hoarded or melted or exported.

This statement of a fact of universal application in the experience of nations through all time varies in its wording but little from that of Nicolas Oresme, a Frenchman, one of the counselors of Charles V in his treatise on money in 1370, almost two hundred years before Gresham. Oresme's statement is:

That the legal ratio of coins must conform strictly to the relative market value of the metals; that if the fixed legal ratio of coins differs from the market value of the metals, the coin which is undervalued entirely disappears from circulation.

In our present money circulation there are two sorts of coin, one of gold, the other of silver; of the same value by denomination, but not intrinsically, i. e., in market value. They both circulate now on a parity with each other, because the Government has pledged its faith, in a duly enacted law, to keep them so, and has promised to keep in its Treasury not less than $100,000,000 in gold for such purpose. By reason of that pledge, an American silver dollar buys in market just as much of anything as a gold dollar. And a paper dollar buys just as much of anything as either a silver or a gold dollar. Take away that pledge, which is entirely independent of our coinage laws, and our gold and silver coins would immediately come under the operation of Gresham's law, which is just as fixed and immutable as Newton's law of gravitation. Take away this Government pledge, and so long as silver should have a less market value than its denomination, gold would not circulate as money. There would then be only silver in circulation so long as there should be any considerable difference in the market value of the two metals, unless both were kept in circulation by some specific agreement among the nations.

Many persons believe that the passage by Congress of a law to reopen the mints of the United States to the free and unrestricted coinage of silver at a ratio of value of 16 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold would of itself restore the silver of the world to its former market price of $1.29 cents an ounce, while it is now selling in all the markets of the world for less than 63 cents an ounce, making the commercial value of our silver dollar about 53 cents. In support of such belief it is claimed that this nation is great enough, rich enough, and powerful enough to legislate on any subject in its own way. Whatever may be claimed for this nation in greatness and power, in territorial extent, in vastness of material resources, and in its ever-increasing wealth and population—grant it all—but this nation is not great enough, rich enough, or powerful enough, nor is any other nation, nor are all the nations of the world put together great enough, or powerful enough, to make 53 cents in commercial value buy in the markets of the world 100 cents in commercial value. This nation is, however, great enough and powerful enough, and so is any other nation, no matter how poor or weak it may be, to make 53 cents in commercial value pay a debt to its own citizens of 100 cents.

There is no nation on the face of the earth, and there never will be one, great enough or powerful enough to fix by law the value in the money unit except for debt paying. Law everywhere makes and fixes the unit of valve, but the dealers in the commodities for which money is exchanged make and fix the real value in the unit. Value in money for trade and commerce is no more the creature of law than is the value in flocks, herds, and cultivated fields. The expectation of acquiring wealth through some theory of legislation has always been more alluring to mankind than by the slow process of labor and economy. But it is not in the power of human ingenuity to devise any scheme by which debased or depreciated money can be used successfully to develop the industries of a country or add to the wealth of a nation.

BUSINESS MAKES MONEY PLENTY.

The advocates of free and unrestricted coinage of silver, no matter what its commercial value may be, have a ready answer to all objections in the question, How can there be too much money? That depends upon its quality. If it is poor money, there is always too much. If good money, then never too much, if there is any use for it. The mere existence of money, no matter how much there may be, creates no business. Money not in circulation neither makes business nor adds anything to what is called prosperity. Business puts money into circulation, not the making of it. While there can not be great prosperity without money, yet business itself must first call for capital, for its development or its enlargement. And capital, which is only accumulated wealth, then furnishes the money for such purpose. Thus is created the demand for labor, and employment gives to labor its purchasing ability, for without employment it has none. In that way comes what is called prosperity. The mere fact of an abundance of money in existence but not in circulation can not make it. There never has been so large an amount of money in this country in time of peace as there has been for the last five or six years. Yet business never languished more, and the ability of labor to buy has seldom, if ever, been less.

There is of money in the country now over sixteen hundred million dollars, all good money, based on gold. A per capita, in round numbers, of $24, being greater than that of any nation, except France, Belgium, Australia, and the Netherlands. It is $3 per capita greater than the per capita in Great Britain. The per capita in gold and silver in this country is equal to that of Great Britain, and greater than that of any other nation except those already mentioned. France has more gold and silver and less paper than any nation. Her per capita is greater than that of any other nation, being $35.97, with only 84 cents of it in paper.

MONEY PER CAPITA.

The following table shows the money per capita and the kind of money in the seven nations having the largest money per capita, and the monetary system of the nation:

Nation.	Gold.	Silver.	Paper.	Total.	Monetary system.
France	$22.19	$12.94	$0.84	$35.97	Gold and silver.
Belgium	8.72	8.71	10.38	27.81	Do.
Australia	24.47	1.49	.....	25.96	Gold.
Netherlands	6.21	11.96	6.08	24.25	Gold and silver.
United States	8.78	8.89	5.93	23.59	Do.
United Kingdom	14.91	2.96	2.91	20.78	Gold.
Germany	12.21	4.20	1.18	17.59	Do.

There is no single silver standard nation in the world that has a money per capita of over $18. Mexico has $4.95 and Russia has $8.46. These two nations are fair representatives of the silver nations in their per capita.

The coinage of silver money of all denominations in the mints of the United States from April, 1792, to February, 1873, was $143,813,598.70; since 1873 to December, 1895, it has been $543,794,030.70, being about four times greater in coinage value for these twenty-two years since 1873 than for the eighty-one years preceding. The money per capita now is greater than ever before in time of peace. Ten years preceding 1892, which is conceded by everybody to be a period of equal if not greater business prosperity than in any other like period in our history, there was through it all the same kind of money we have now, except that there was less per capita and less of silver money. Whatever depression, therefore, there may be in the business of the country, or want of prosperity in its industries at this time, can not possibly be caused by a lack of money, especially in the coinage of silver.

COINAGE OF GOLD AND SILVER.

The coinage of silver money in the United States for the ten years preceding 1893, the year the law was repealed for Government purchase of silver bullion, was, coinage value, $301,926,941, and the coinage of gold for the same time was $271,095,731, the silver coinage for the ten years being $31,000,000 greater than the gold. The world's coinage of silver money for the ten years preceding 1893 was, coinage value, $1,340,558,658, and the world's coinage of gold for the same period was $1,264,181,751, the silver coinage of the world for these ten years being $76,000,000 greater than the gold. For the year 1873 the world's coinage of silver money, coinage value, was about one-half as much as the coinage of gold. For the year 1888 the world's coinage of gold and silver was almost identically the same, each being, in round numbers, $135,000,000. For the three years ending with 1895 the world's coinage of gold alone was $691,042,987, being a larger average annual coinage of gold than the average annual coinage of both gold and silver from 1881 to 1887. Whatever may be the condition, therefore, of the business of this country at the present time can not possibly result from too little coinage of silver money any more than from too little coinage of gold. For the coinage of silver, like its production in the last twenty years, has greatly exceeded that of any equal period in the history of mankind. The public mind at this time is not so much disturbed about the quantity of money as about its quality, and as to what may be its character in the future.

Jefferson, in his notes on coinage in 1786 to Robert Morris, then Superintendent of Finance, says:

> The proportion between the value of gold and silver is a mercantile problem altogether. Just principles will lead us to disregard legal proportions altogether and inquire into the market price of gold in the several countries with which we shall principally be connected in commerce, and to take an average from them.

He recommended "the appointment of persons to inquire what are the proportions between the volume of the value of fine gold and fine silver at the markets of the several countries with which we are, or probably may be, connected in commerce, and what would be the proper proportion here, having regard to the average of the value at these markets." Jefferson, unlike many of the professed statesmen of to-day, did not think it wise to attempt to settle legal proportions between gold and silver without reference to the market value of the metals in the nations with which we should be connected in commerce. That the present market value of silver could be materially changed by the mere passage of a law by Congress for its free coinage at its old ratio of value to gold would seem to be utterly impossible, in view of the relative production of gold and silver in the world since 1850 and the decline in the market value of silver since 1859.

WORLD'S PRODUCTION OF GOLD AND SILVER.

The following statements of the production of gold and silver, including market price and coinage value of silver, are based upon the tables compiled by Dr. Adolph Soetbeer, who is, as all know, a most competent and reliable authority on these subjects. His tables of production and price, with the additions of the Directors of the Mint, for four hundred years are embodied in the Annual Report of the Director of the United States Mint for 1895 and 1896.

The following table shows the world's production of gold and silver, coinage value, from 1841 to 1895, both years inclusive, in periods of ten years each, except for the last five years:

Years.	Gold.	Silver.
1841-50	$363,928,000	$324,400,000
1851-60	1,332,981,000	372,261,000
1861-70	1,263,015,000	507,174,000
1871-80	1,150,814,000	918,578,000
1881-90	1,060,055,600	1,298,846,900
1891-95	815,664,500	1,025,742,300
Since 1850 (45 years)	5,622,530,100	4,122,602,200

The silver production of the world, coinage value, for the twenty years from 1855 to and including 1875 was $1,104,588,000; for the twenty years from 1875 to and including 1895 it was $2,833,845,200, being $1,729,257,200 greater for the twenty years ending with 1895 than for the twenty years ending with 1875. While the silver production of the world, coinage value, for the ten years ending with 1860 was less than a third in value of the gold production for that period, the production for the ten years ending with 1895 was $349,678,100 greater in value than the gold production for the same period.

The following table shows the production of gold and silver in the world in ounces and coinage value for each of the following years:

Year.	Gold.		Silver.
	Ounces.	Value.	Ounces.	Value.
1840	652,291	$13,484,000	19,175,867	$24,793,000
1850	1,760,502	36,393,000	25,080,342	32,440,000
1860	6,486,282	134,083,000	29,093,428	37,618,000
1870	6,270,086	129,614,000	45,051,533	55,603,000
1895	9,683,821	200,285,700	169,180,945	218,796,100

The great increase in the world's annual production of gold began in 1850. The great increase in silver began in 1860. The world's production of silver, coinage value, for the year 1840 was, in round numbers, $25,000,000; for the year 1860 it was, in round numbers, $38,000,000, being less than a third in value of the gold for that year. Its production for the year 1870 was $56,000,000, and for 1895, in round numbers, it was $219,000,000.

MARKET PRICE OF SILVER.

The world's annual production of silver and market price since 1859 was as follows:

Year.	Ounces.	Coinage value.	Market price.	Price less than 1859.
1859	20,005,428	$37,618,000	$1.36
1861	25,401,972	45,772,000	1.33½	.02½
1870	45,051,533	55,603,000	1.32½	.03½
1873	63,317,814	81,804,000	1.29½	.06½
1875	70,996,708	91,585,753	1.24½	.11½
1880	78,775,602	101,851,000	1.14½	.21½
1886	93,297,290	120,626,800	.99½	.36½
1894	167,732,561	216,802,200	.63½	.72½

In 1859 the market value of silver was $1.36 an ounce, the highest price ever known, before or since. Its market price in 1861 was $1.33½ an ounce, being 2½ cents an ounce less than in 1859; the world's production for that year, coinage value, in round numbers was $46,000,000. Its market price in 1870 was $1.32½ an ounce, being 3½ cents less than in 1859, and its production for that year was in round numbers $56,000,000. Its market price in 1873 was $1.29½ an ounce, being 6½ cents an ounce less than in 1859, and the world's production for the year 1873 was in round numbers $82,000,000. Its market price in 1875 was $1.24½, being 11½ cents less than in 1859; the world's production that year was in round numbers $92,000,000. Its market price in 1880 was $1.14½, being 21½ cents less than in 1859; the world's production was in round numbers $102,000,000. Its market price in 1886 was 99½ cents an ounce, being 36½ cents an ounce less than in 1859; the world's production for that year was in round numbers $121,000,000. Its market price in 1894 was about 63½ cents an ounce, being 73 cents an ounce less than in 1859; the world's production for 1894 was in round numbers $217,000,000.

This great increase in the world's production of silver for the last twenty years and the present production of both gold and silver, with their prospective increase for the future, renders it absolutely impossible for the free coinage of silver by this nation alone at a ratio of value to gold of 16 to 1 to add materially to the market value of silver.

COINAGE CREATES NO VALUE.

Reopening the mints to free and unrestricted coinage of silver would not create a single purchaser for it. The owners of the bullion brought to the mints would be the owners of the money coined therefrom. Coinage itself only stamps upon the coin its denomination, which is in reality only the same thing as stamping on it the weight and fineness of the metal out of which it is coined. That is all that law can do, except to fix the amount of indebtedness which the denomination of the coin would pay within the jurisdiction of the law. Law makes and fixes its denomination and debt-paying value. Its commercial value is fixed by the dealers in the commodities for which it is exchanged. As the uses of money for debt paying are so much less than its uses for trade and business, if its commercial value is much less than its debt-paying value it will fall to its commercial value for any purpose after the debts are paid existing at the time of its coinage or the fall in its market value. For all creditors, before creating a debt, if they know what the debt can be paid in, will see to it that the amount of the debt is enough greater to meet the difference, whatever it may be, in the commercial value and the debt-paying value of the legal tender to be received.

With free coinage the owner of silver bullion would have two ways of disposing of it. One, to sell it in the market, just as he does now; the other, to take it to the mint and have it coined. After coinage he would then have two methods of disposing of his coin. One, to pay his own debts, if he had any; the other would be to buy something with it. In debt paying it would pass at its denominational value to a person within the jurisdiction of the law under which it was coined. Its purchasing value in business would be its commercial value; that is, the market price of the metal out of which it may be coined. And there is no ingenuity of the human intellect that could by law change these conditions of trade.

Since Abraham paid Ephron for the Cave of Machpelah 400 shekels of silver, "current money with the merchant," mankind in business transactions with each other have dealt in realities, not in fictions; and that will continue to be the case until the acquisition of property ceases to be a desire of the human heart and the love of money is no longer an incentive to action. In this earliest business transaction settled with money (of which we have any account), it was money current with the merchant. From that time to this the merchant—that is, the dealer in property for which money is exchanged—determines what money shall be current by fixing its commercial value, in receiving or rejecting it in trade for commodities, or in payment for property purchased.

The decline in market value of silver began while all the mints of the world were open to its free coinage, just as they had been for years before. No mint of any nation was closed before 1870. Silver, with its yearly increasing production, has continued to decline in market price since 1860, and it never has at any time regained the market price it sold for in 1870. Without some agreement, therefore, with the leading commercial nations as to the use of silver as a money metal, three grave questions in our monetary affairs will be presented for final settlement: First, whether we shall have a single silver standard, without any gold circulating as money; second, whether we shall continue the gold standard that we now have, with the pledge of the Government to keep silver money in circulation as now coined on a parity with gold; third, whether we shall have a single gold standard with silver circulating in subsidiary coin, on its market value for coinage, just as we had both metals from 1806 to 1878.

Without some agreement with or concurrent action by other nations for the use of silver as a money metal the result of reopening the mints of the United States to the free and unrestricted coinage of silver at a ratio of value of 16 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold, with the present market value of silver, would be: First, to drive all gold in this country out of circulation as money. Second, all debts due American citizens would be paid, if paid at all, at about 50 cents on the dollar, while all debts of American citizens due to citizens of foreign countries, not having a single silver standard, must be paid, if paid at all, at 100 cents on the dollar. A foreigner could buy silver bullion at the present market price of silver costing about $500,000, and take it to the mints of the United States, have it coined into about 1,000,000 of our standard dollars, and with such dollars he could pay a million dollars of indebtedness to citizens of this country, while an American citizen with a million of our standard silver dollars could pay only about $500,000 of indebtedness to citizens in foreign countries not having a single silver standard. Third, while the rate of wages would probably remain about the same as now, they would be payable in this depreciated silver money, which would then be the standard in our money unit. Thus would be established in reality for this country a single silver standard of money.

Should we keep the double standard as we now have it, by reason of the guaranty or pledge of the Government to keep silver, as money, on a parity with gold, no matter what the market value or the ratio of coinage might be, it would, so far as the Government is concerned, be in reality the same as having a single gold standard. For in all business fairness and honest dealing, even without such guaranty or pledge, the Government must pay gold on all its obligations, unless some other kind of payment is specifically named. In all cases where the debtor does not make legal tenders for the payment of debts, the debtor has the option of paying in any tender, if there is more than one; yet where the debtor himself makes the legal tenders, his creditors have the option as to which legal tender, if there is more than one, they will receive in payment of their debt. If that were not the case, then the debtor could make a worthless tender for the payment of debts, while there might be a good one in existence. In such case, if the debtor could select the legal tender for the payment of his debt, it would be a violation of the first great precept in equity, that the wrongdoer can not take advantage of his own wrong.

So long as 371¼ grains of pure silver—the weight fixed by our coinage law for a dollar in silver—was the equivalent in market value of 23.22 grains of pure gold—the weight fixed by our coinage law for a dollar in gold—the market value of each kept them as money, on a parity with each other, without any Government pledge or guarantee. So long as silver bullion sold in market for $1.29 an ounce, and it was coined into money at a ratio of 16 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold, each would exchange for the other, as 2 bushels of corn at 50 cents a bushel would be the equivalent of 1 bushel of wheat at a dollar, provided each sold in market as readily as the other at these prices. But when silver bullion of the same fineness fell in market value below $1.29 an ounce, then the parity in money value between it and gold was broken. At $1.29 an ounce 16 ounces of silver was the equivalent in market value of 1 ounce of gold, and each was selling in market as readily as the other.

FREE COINAGE OF GOLD AND SILVER.

So long as silver retained a market price of $1.29 an ounce, individuals owning silver bullion, the same as those owning gold bullion, could take it to the mint and have it coined into money of such denominations as might be fixed by law, without expense to themselves, for the reason that the silver was of the same market value before coinage as after. Its coinage, therefore, being only for the convenience of the public in doing business, was without expense to the owner, so it was called free coinage. But the owner of the bullion put the money coined into circulation and had whatever advantage might result from changing it from bullion to money. It made no difference how much silver bullion was coined into money so long as its market value at the relative ratio of coinage with gold was the same. That is, so long as 16 ounces of silver was equivalent, or nearly so, in market value to 1 ounce of gold, the mints of the world were everywhere open to the unrestricted coinage of silver. From 1792 to 1873 the mints of the United States were open to the free and unrestricted coinage of silver, except that the coinage of silver dollars was suspended from 1806 to 1834 by an order of Jefferson. The total coinage of silver of all denominations from 1792 to 1873 in the mints of the United States was done for individuals, and amounted to $143,813,598. Since 1878 all coinage of silver in the mints of the United States has been from bullion purchased by the Government, and the mints have been closed to the coinage of silver for individuals. But the total coinage of silver of all denominations from 1873 to December 31, 1895, was, as before stated, $543,794,030, being almost four times greater in these twenty-two years than for the eighty-one years preceding. For each of these silver dollars, or for the certificate which represents them, so coined and paid out the Government has received 100 cents, no matter what it paid for the bullion it purchased or what the market value of silver may have been.

Hence in business fairness the Government pledge to keep silver money on a parity with gold. But the reopening of our mints to the free and unrestricted coinage of silver at the old ratio of 16 to 1 would of necessity change all this. The Government would then cease to coin on its own account, and individuals would again put silver money into circulation coined out of their own bullion; and whatever profit or advantage there might be in the coinage would be theirs instead of the Government's. The Government could not, therefore, stand responsible for the money thus coined, and it would go forth, as in all cases of free and unrestricted coinage of money, without any redeemer except its own intrinsic value.

USE OF CREDIT INSTRUMENTALITIES.

If it would not be advisable for this nation to adopt either of the foregoing plans in its monetary affairs, then the only other alternative, in case of no agreement among the nations, would be a single gold standard in our money unit, with silver circulating as subsidiary coin. Whether that would be advisable and could be done successfully would depend, first, upon whether there is gold enough in the world for the world's business should all nations adopt it as the standard in their money of ultimate redemption, and whether, in case that should be done, there would be a reasonable probability that the future annual production of gold would be sufficient for any increase there might be in the world's business. To ascertain whether such a result would be possible, there are many considerations to be considered in connection therewith, and upon which ultimate success would largely, if not wholly, depend.

Reliable statistics show that of all the business transactions of the people of commercial nations as now transacted not to exceed 8 per cent of the volume of such transactions are made with actual money. The other 92 per cent is made with what is called substitute money or credit, like bank bills, bills of exchange, checks, drafts, letters of credit, and certificates of various kinds. This substitute or credit money answers just as well if not better for the transaction of business, if it is at all times convertible at the will of the holder at its face value into money of real or commercial value, commonly called intrinsic value. To illustrate, 1,000 persons owe each to the other $1. The first one has a dollar deposited in the bank. He draws a check on the bank for a dollar and passes it to his creditor, who takes it, if he believes it will be paid when presented at the bank. The second one does the same, and so it passes from one to the other until it again reaches the drawer of the check. One thousand dollars of indebtedness has been discharged and not a dollar in actual money has been used in doing it. This process is the same in large or small transactions by which business is done on what is called credit. But it could not be done at all without the actual dollar, which is called the money of ultimate redemption, nor without confidence that the dollar itself would be paid when the check should be presented. Without such confidence the dollar itself would have to be used in each transaction.

While the check was the instrument used to discharge $1,000 of indebtedness, yet the check itself was not paid, and no matter how many times it might be passed it would not be paid until the holder received for it $1 in commercial value. By its use the creditor simply exchanges one debtor for another. But without the confidence that the dollar of commercial value promised would be paid whenever the check should be presented, the first creditor to whom it should be offered would refuse to take it, and so on with every other one. The same would be true with the purchaser of commodities. No one would take the check for his commodity except in full faith and confidence that the dollar of commercial value which it promised was on deposit to be paid whenever called for. Law makes all the regulations for the use of substitute money, and makes and fixes the money unit in the standard of value, but can not make or fix the value in the unit itself except for debt paying. There must therefore be the actual commercial value in the money of ultimate redemption called for in all this substitute money, or it would be no better than the paper rags of which it is composed.

The record of the clearing house of the city of New York, where all the business transactions passing through the banks of that city are settled daily, shows that not more than 8 per cent of the amount of business transactions are settled with actual money. The following statement is taken from the annual report of the clearing house of New York City for the year 1895.

The clearing-house transactions for the year have been as follows:

Exchanges	$28,264,379,126.23
Balances	1,896,574,349.11
Total transactions	30,160,953,475.34

The average daily transactions:

Exchanges	$92,670,095.49
Balances	6,214,276.55
Total	98,888,372.04

The average daily transactions for 1895, in round numbers, were $100,000,000. The actual money used in settling the final balance was, in round numbers, $6,000,000. As standard or coin money of commercial value is not consumed or destroyed, the same $6,000,000 would pay the balance of $100,000,000 of transactions the next day just the same, and so on through the year. From bank reports and reliable estimates there is at this time in this country about $600,000,000 in gold. That is a sufficient amount of actual standard money with our present facilities of communication and transportation to sustain in ordinary times of business confidence a volume of daily business transactions of ten thousand million dollars; which would be one hundred times greater than the daily business transactions of the city of New York, as shown by the report of its clearing house.

While this 8 per cent of the volume of business transactions in real money, that is, money of intrinsic value, might be sufficient in times of business confidence, yet to make sure that such confidence would not be injuriously affected in times of panicky distrust it is necessary that there should be in existence a larger amount of real money of ultimate redemption than 8 per cent of the volume of ordinary business transactions. Exactly how much larger it should be is not easily determined. That would depend upon facilities for communication and the cost and time in transportation. Less money would be required the greater the facilities, and the less the time and the cost in both communication and transportation. It would depend also largely upon what was used as money, and what was the standard of value in the money unit.

STANDARD MONEY.

What is money? What are its uses, and how can it be affected by law? Money is what is used to facilitate the exchange of commodities and the transfer of property, and to pay for the property transferred, and the difference in the values of the commodities exchanged. The essential requisites for standard money, that is, money of ultimate redemption, are:

First. That it shall retain the same value when paid out that it had when it was received; otherwise some one would be a loser by its use.

Second. That it shall contain the greatest amount of commercial value in the smallest space; for weight and bulk affects both convenience and expense in its use.

Third. That it shall be regarded by all who use it of the same commercial value; otherwise the uncertainty in the discounts or premiums to be agreed upon would destroy its uniform and certain value.

Fourth. That it shall be of a substance indestructible by fire, thus avoiding loss or the risk and expense of insurance.

Gold possesses all these requisites for such money in a greater degree than any other known substance; hence it has been used as money by all commercial nations. An additional reason to the inherent qualities already mentioned why gold is preferable as money over any other known metal is that it varies less in amount and cost of production from year to year, as proven by the experience of four hundred years, if not for all time. Another reason in its favor, the others being conceded, is its beauty. Everywhere and in everything, all else being equal, beauty rules the world. Silver has one of the requisites of standard money, the same as gold; it is indestructible by fire; but in all other respects it is not equal to gold as a money metal. While both gold and silver have been used as money from the earliest times, yet gold has always been regarded as the most desirable. In our earliest record of mankind, one branch of the river that went out of the Garden of Eden compasseth the land of good gold.

How is the standard of value in money fixed and what are its requisites? The standard or measure of anything must partake of the nature of the thing of which it is the standard. If it is the standard of length, it must itself have length, like the yardstick. If it is the standard of weight, it must itself have weight, like the pound. So of the standard of cubic contents, like the bushel. In the standards and units of weights and measures value is not involved; therefore law makes and fixes the standard. The words of the Constitution are:

> Congress may coin money, regulate the value thereof, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

Law makes and fixes the unit of value, just as it makes and fixes the unit of weights and measures; but it does not make or fix real value in one case any more than in the other. It regulates the relative value in one case and fixes the standard in the other. It regulates the value in money by fixing the alloy and the relative weights of the metals in exchangeable value.

THE UNIT OF VALUE.

The units fixed by law are only part of the arithmetic intended to facilitate a final settlement and payment of balances in business transactions. With us the unit of value is a dollar. In England it is a pound sterling. In France it is a franc, and so on, differing in different nations. These units differing in different nations, made by law for convenience, could be changed into any others, and the new ones would answer just as well; but the value in the money unit itself is not made by law. That the value in the standard of value varies with the amount of commodities, like wheat, corn, or cotton, which it would buy at different times is a perfect absurdity. If that was the case, then the commodities, varying in their production with the seasons, would be the standard of value. The standard of value could not itself be changing with abundant or short crops, or by decreasing or increasing demand for them. As the standard of value measures the value in all commodities, it can not itself be changing in its own value by the increasing or lessening quantity of any commodity.

The standard of value in the money unit of nations is a certain number of grains of gold, not so many bushels of potatoes, beets, or onions. The value of a grain of gold of certain fineness has been fixed by the acquiescing consent, the consensus of opinion of commercial nations, and it is of the same commercial value in them all. It is an absurdity that the standard of value by which the value in all commodities is measured could itself vary with the seasons, hot or cold, wet or dry, upon which depend the supply and demand of the commodities produced. Abundant or short crops, supply and demand in commodities, determine how many grains of gold shall be paid for them at different times. And the number of grains of gold will vary with the supply and demand of the commodity; but the value of the grain of gold itself does not vary, and can not while it continues to be the standard. If it did, it would no longer be a standard any more than would a yardstick 36 inches long be the standard of the yard in length if it was expanding and contracting with wet or dry weather.

In the report to Congress made by Robert Morris in 1783 on coinage and establishing a mint he says:

> It is right that money should acquire a value as money, distinct from that which it possesses as a commodity, in order that it should be a fixed rule whereby to measure the value of all other things.

Unlike the wise statesmen of our times, he did not think all other things called commodities could measure the value in gold or in the standard of the money unit. A grain of gold is the unit in weight of the money standard of value in all commercial nations to-day, and by it is settled and paid the balances in trade of them all, no matter whether gold or silver standard nations, in their domestic policy. Twenty-three and twenty-two hundredths grains of gold of a certain fineness is a dollar in our legal unit of value. A hundred and thirteen and one-tenth grains of gold of a certain fineness is a pound sterling in the legal unit of value in English money. But the value of the grain of gold is the same in either. Four cents three mills and a fraction is its value in our money, and it is equivalent to that value in the money of any commercial nation. Multiply 23.22—the number of grains in our dollar—by four cents three mills and a fraction, and the sum will be within a small fraction of 100 cents—i. e., our dollar. Multiply 113.1—the number of grains of gold in a pound sterling—by four cents three mills and a fraction, and the sum will be $4.86 and a fraction—the value of a pound sterling in our money, without reference to exchange. So with the gold in the money unit of any nation. The grain of gold of a certain fineness is everywhere the same in standard value, and what are called premiums or discounts are in reality only the discounts or varying amounts in value of what is to be exchanged for the gold.

PURCHASING POWER OF GOLD.

We hear much about the purchasing power of gold varying at different times, implying that the value of the gold unit in the standard of value itself is of greater or less value at one time than another. This is a confusion of terms in the use of language. The cheapening of the cost of commodities by reason of inventions in labor-saving machinery, greater skill in various appliances of human ingenuity, may so reduce the cost of any commodity that the same number of grains of gold will purchase a much larger quantity at one time than another, the supply and demand remaining the same; but the value in a grain of gold would be the same in either case, and must continue to be the same so long as it is the standard of value. Will anyone contend that because wheat sold six months ago for 50 cents a bushel and now sells for $1 the value in the grain or ounce of gold that paid for it is now one-half what it was six months ago? Can the value in the grain of gold itself, in the money unit of the standard of value, which measures the value in all commodities, be varying with the supply and demand of the commodities themselves? If so, then there is no fixed standard of value independent of the supply and demand of the commodities. If that were the case, then the value in the money unit of the standard of value shrinks and expands to meet the conditions of supply and demand, and what is called the purchasing power of gold would then be greatest when the supply of commodities is greatest and the demand least, no matter what the cost of production might be, and vice versa in their supply and demand.

The value of the grain of gold in the money unit of the standard of value must remain the same through the varying conditions of supply and demand and cost of production in commodities, or there could be no such thing as a fixed standard of value. If that is not the case, then it is possible to have a fixed standard of weights and measures, but impossible to have a fixed standard of value, the most essential thing in all the business affairs of life, that will not be varying with the supply and demand and cost of production of commodities, the value of which is to be measured by the standard itself. The greater purchasing power of gold at one time over another consists in the cheapening of the cost, or the increase of supply over demand, of the commodities purchased, and not in an absolute increase in the value of a grain of gold. It may take more grains of gold at one time than another to buy the same quantity or amount of commodities, by reason of their greater or less cost in labor, by abundant or short supplies; but the real value in the grain of gold in the money unit of the standard of value must remain the same, and the variation in the amount or quantity of commodities that it will buy is not in the value of the unit, but in the greater or less cost of, or the respective supply and demand of, what is to be exchanged for it. No matter how many grains of gold, more or less, any commodity may at any given time command in the market, the value in the grain of gold itself continues the same, and that must necessarily be the case so long as it is the standard of value in the money unit of nations. It can no more be changed by one nation than can the mathematics of the world be changed by a nation attempting to change the axiom of the multiplication table that twice 1 are 2 into twice 1 are 4.

The scale of feet and inches on the stone or iron pier for marking the rise and fall of the tides or the flow of rivers marks the depth of the surrounding water, no matter how much or how little there may be; so the standard of value measures the rise and fall in the value of all commodities by the number of grains of gold which are required in payment. But the value in the grain of gold itself, so long as it is the standard, can no more vary than can the inches in the feet of the scale on the stone or iron pier. If it does, then it is no longer the standard of value, and the value in commodities would be measured by something else.

ONE STANDARD OF VALUE.

For a money standard of value the world might have selected some other metal, or it might have placed a different value on a grain of gold. But as that has not been done, any attempt to change it now would be like an attempt to change the mathematics of the world. There can be but one real standard of value in use in the same nation at the same time, no matter what may be in use as money. All attempts to fix a double standard, as it is called, has always required more or less legislation to keep both in circulation. While changes in alloy and relative weights have been resorted to for that purpose, the value in the grain of gold itself has remained unchanged.

Congress in 1853 changed all the silver coins of less denomination than the dollar from being proportionate parts of 412½ grains of standard silver to proportionate parts of 385 grains and a fraction, and fixed the legal tender for all silver at $5, which continued until 1873. The changes in legislation in 1834, 1853, and in 1873 were all made in order to keep a double standard, by keeping silver circulating on a parity with gold as a money metal.

Hamilton, in his report as Secretary of the Treasury on the establishment of a mint in 1791, said:

> As long as gold, either from its intrinsic superiority as a metal, from its rarity, or from the prejudices of mankind, retains so considerable a preeminence in value over silver as it has heretofore had, a natural consequence of this seems to be that its condition will be more stationary. The revolutions, therefore, which may take place in the comparative value of gold and silver will be changes in the state of the latter rather than that of the former. One consequence of overvaluing either metal in respect to the other is the banishment of that which is undervalued. There is scarcely any point in the economy of national affairs of greater moment than the uniform preservation of the intrinsic value of the money unit. On this the security and steady value of property essentially depends.

This declaration of Hamilton applies to all time and to all nations.

The standard of value in the dealings of mankind must be a fixture. Otherwise, how could agreements be made for future execution? If it is proposed to buy cloth of the merchant for future delivery, how could the merchant fix a price per yard if he could not tell what the length of the yardstick by which it must be measured would be at the time of delivery? If there were two yardsticks fixed by local law different in number of inches, then, of course, it would have to be specified which should be used. But if all mankind consented and tacitly agreed that the space measured by 36 inches would be a yard in all the dealings of mankind which were to be settled by measurement, that would be a standard of length which nobody would take into account as liable to vary, and whatever local legislation there might be would only relate to adapting other things to it. So with the world's standard of value in gold. All legislation has been only in relation to its debt paying, and to adapting other things to it in debt paying, or in exchangeable value.

As gold possesses all the requisites for a money standard of value and is in every way preferable as a money metal, there can not possibly be any objection to making it the standard of value in all commercial nations, provided that as standard money of ultimate redemption there would be enough of it in the world for the world's business, and that there would be a reasonable probability that its annual increase in production would be sufficient for any increase there might be in the world's business transactions. Whether that would be possible depends upon the relative production of gold and silver in the past, and the present annual production of gold, and its probable production for the future.

The world's annual production of gold alone now exceeds the annual production of both gold and silver twenty years ago or for any time previous to that. The world's coinage of gold alone into money for the three years ending with December 31, 1895, was $691,052,047, an average annual coinage of $230,350,682, being in round numbers $5,000,000 larger than the average annual coinage of both gold and silver from 1878 to 1888. The world's coinage of both gold and silver for the nine years from 1878 to 1888 was $2,033,725,461, being an average annual coinage of $225,969,495, which is $4,381,187 less than the average annual coinage of gold alone for the three years ending with 1895.

As neither gold nor silver are consumed, and as they are indestructible by fire or floods, all the gold and silver produced since the beginning of time is to-day in the keeping of mankind, except what may have been used in the arts and in manufactures, and the little that may have been lost in use.

Dr. Soetbeer's tables show that if the mints of all nations had been closed in 1850 to the coinage of silver into money, except what was then in existence, the world's annual production of gold since that time, as shown by these statistics of its production, would have been more than sufficient in standard money—i. e., money of ultimate redemption—for the world's business, just as it has been conducted from that time to this. And the annual production of gold at the rate of its production since 1891 would be sufficient in standard money for any probable increase in the world's business for the future.

For the year 1850, the beginning of the great increase in gold, the world's production was $36,393,000, and that was double the production of any previous year. For the year 1840 the world's production was $13,484,000, an increase in annual production in the ten years from 1840 to 1850 of $22,909,000. The world's entire gold production for twenty years preceding 1850 was $498,769,000, being an average annual production of $24,938,450. But the increase in the annual production of gold in the ten years immediately preceding 1850 having been $22,909,000, add that amount to the $24,938,450, average annual production for the twenty years, would make $47,647,450. Call it, in round numbers, $50,000,000 annual production of gold required for the world's business in standard money of ultimate redemption in 1850, in addition to the silver money then in use. That would be an amount in annual production more than three times greater than any year before 1840, and more than double any year previous to 1850. Then multiply $50,000,000 annual production by forty-five, the number of years from 1851 to 1895, inclusive, would make the sum of $2,250,000,000 in gold production required in standard money for the world's business for the forty-five years from 1851 to and including 1895.

WORLD'S SUPPLY OF SILVER GREATER THAN DEMAND.

When silver reached an annual production in 1860 of $37,618,000, its market price began to fall. In 1870 it had fallen 3½ cents per ounce below its price in 1859. In 1870, as I have already stated, the mints of all nations were open to the free coinage of silver just as they had been for years before, so that the closing of the mints could not have effected the fall in price. Silver continued to decline in market price and was 6¼ cents an ounce less in 1873 than in 1859, and it never regained its market price of 1859 or 1870, notwithstanding the purchase by the Government for a number of years of substantially the entire silver production of American mines. But it continued to decline in all the markets of the world, until now it is less than one-half the price it sold for in 1870. The world's annual production of silver, therefore, had reached a supply before 1870 beyond the world's demand for its use, otherwise it would not have fallen steadily in market price for the ten years after 1859 and before the closing of any mint. This fact indicates that an annual production of silver of about $37,000,000 was all that the world's business required in 1870, for demand and supply regulate the market price of every product of labor.

The entire production of silver in the world for the twenty years preceding 1870 was, coinage value, $879,435,000, being an average annual production for that period of $43,971,750. Call it in round numbers $44,000,000. The decline in market value of silver from 1859 to 1870 of 3¼ cents an ounce, which it never regained, is conclusive, as I have already stated, that the world's production of silver had then in annual production reached, if it had not already passed, the limit required by the world in silver for its business transactions. But whether it had or not, that was the world's entire production for the twenty years. The increase since that time in the facilities for communication, the lessening of time and the cheapening in expense of transportation, would seem to render unnecessary any considerable increase of annual production in order to meet any increase there might have been in the world's business.

It is obvious that the world's increased facilities for doing business since 1870 have been much greater than the world's increase in population since that time. But call the average annual production of silver required for the world's business after 1870 in round numbers $44,000,000, which is a larger annual production than for any year before that time. Multiply this average annual production by twenty-five, the number of years from 1870 to 1895, inclusive, would make a sum of $1,100,000,000 as the amount of silver required from 1870 to and including 1895. To that amount add the entire production of silver from 1851 to 1870 of $879,435,000, making a total sum of $1,979,435,000, which would be what the world's business would have required in silver production, from 1851 to 1895, for its business transactions just as they were conducted during that period. On this basis of calculation the world would have required in standard money for all its business transactions of both gold and silver a production in these forty-five years from 1850 to 1895 of $4,229,435,000.

GOLD ENOUGH FOR THE WORLD'S BUSINESS.

The gold production of the world alone for this period from 1850 to and including 1895 was $5,622,530,100. So for these forty-five years from 1850 to 1895 if there had been no silver money in circulation except as subsidiary coin, there would have been a surplus in the world's production of gold of $1,393,095,100 over and above settling in gold the balances in the world's current business just in the way it was conducted. This $1,393,095,100 is the amount in gold production since 1850 over and above the world's business requirements for this period, in standard money of ultimate redemption, which might have been used additionally in the arts and manufactures, or to meet any unforeseen contingency in the world's business.

The increase in the world's production of gold, therefore, for the last twenty-five years shows conclusively that there is gold enough in the world for standard money—that is, money of ultimate redemption—for the world's business, without silver at all, except in subsidiary coin. With the present commercial value of silver in the markets of the world, and with the relative annual production of gold and silver, if there shall be no agreement with leading commercial nations for the use of silver as a money metal, then the great question to settle in our monetary policy will be whether we shall have a gold standard with silver circulating in subsidiary coin, just as we always had it after the time Jefferson suspended the coinage of silver dollars in 1806, until the coinage of silver dollars was resumed in 1878, or whether we shall have a single silver standard without any gold in circulation as money. For, as proven by the experience of all nations through all time, there can be no such thing as money coins, circulating at the same time in the same nation, coined at a ratio of value to each other differing materially from the commercial value of the metals out of which they are coined, without a specific government guaranty, or some arrangement for their redemption at their denominational value.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am not willing to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] to interpret the Republican platform for me. [Applause.] I do not understand that document as he has attempted to interpret it here, and I do not believe that the Republicans of the United States understood it as he attempts to give it interpretation. I find in that platform, Mr. Speaker, a pledge that the Republican party would use all honorable exertions to labor to secure the very international agreement that is looked to in this bill. It must be remembered that the Republican party does not change its views every year, and that the Republican platform of 1896 is but a continuation of the platform of 1892. There is no material difference between them. Every declaration that you find in one you find clearly stated in the other, or find to be a fair and just implication from that which is stated.

In 1892 we expressly commended the efforts that were then being made by a Republican Administration in the direction of an international conference. When we made the declaration that we did make in the platform, that we would use all honest efforts to secure international agreement, every man understood that that was in continuation of the policy of the last Republican Administration, and through this very means of an international conference. That, I say, was the understanding of everyone. I want to disclaim again, Mr. Speaker, the right of the gentleman from New York to interpret the platform to mean that we pledged ourselves irrevocably to a gold standard and against the free coinage of silver. Our declaration ought not to be so construed by anyone. Here it is:

> The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money. It caused the enactment of the law providing for the resumption of specie payment.

"Specie payment," observe—not gold. It plumes itself upon that fact.

> Since then every dollar has been as good as gold. We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our country. We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver except by international agreement—

"Except by international agreement." "Except" is the emphatic word. There is a pledge that we are in favor of the free coinage of silver through an international agreement. No man can escape that language. The platform goes on—> except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be preserved.

Do you find in that language an irrevocable pledge for all time to the gold standard? The pledge is that "until" we can secure this international agreement "which we pledge ourselves to promote," we will maintain the existing gold standard.

Mr. Speaker, with the views that I have of this platform, I could not utter the sentiments the gentleman from New York has uttered without regarding myself as an apostate from Republicanism and as recreant to the pledge. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIGG. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill. I can not give it my support. In my humble opinion bimetallism, that is, the concurrent circulation of gold and silver at a fixed ratio, each as a money of ultimate redemption, is a thing of the past, and I have no disposition to attempt to revive it. In my judgment, too, bimetallism is an absolute impossibility. I take no stock, sir, in the proposition that a mere statute can create values. A legislative enactment can no more control the immutable laws of trade than it can control the laws of God. When the market ratio between two metals is one thing, it can not by the simple edict of a legislative body be changed to another thing. The law of supply and demand will inevitably perform its perfect work, and the market ratio and not the legal ratio will prevail. We know something, sir, of bimetallism from our own experience.

Up to 1834 we had it in theory, as a matter of law, but as a matter of fact during all of that period we were upon a silver basis; we had only silver monometallism, gold having risen to a premium and gone out of circulation. Since 1834, down to the present, while for most of the time we have had bimetallism written in our laws, we have in fact been upon the existing gold standard. England tried bimetallism for years prior to 1816, and yet she was always on a monometallic basis, either on the gold basis or on the silver basis, according to which of the metals was the cheaper.

Mr. Speaker, if the immutable laws of trade, operating through the relation of supply and demand, make bimetallism impossible to a single nation, will you tell me how you can possibly expect that these laws will work any different results under an agreement for bimetallism among several nations? If every nation on the face of the globe to-day were to agree to the free coinage of gold and silver at a fixed ratio, in a short time you would have monometallism, either gold or silver, according to whichever metal was least in demand in the markets of the world.

Mr. TOWNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. No, sir. I mean no discourtesy to the gentleman, but my time is limited.

Mr. Speaker, relief for the country is to be found in standing by the gold standard, which is as naturally evolved from the progress of mankind as is the telegraph, the sewing machine, or the great transatlantic ocean steamer; which is evolved from the necessities of trade and commerce, and not from a conspiracy upon the part of one class against the rights and interests of another class, as is often falsely asserted. Of this I have not the shadow of a doubt—gold is the best tool of trade, and is best adapted to the needs of a high civilization and a great commercial nation like our own. We should stand by the existing gold standard, sir, floating with it all the silver that we can safely maintain at a parity with it by the gold valuation. We should retire our greenbacks and our United States notes. We should divorce the Government from any of the functions of a bank of issue. We should put the burden of issuing paper money on the banks, where it properly belongs, they being amply able, under a well-devised system of banking and currency, to sustain it. We should so amend our national banking law as to give to the country not simply a sound and uniform paper currency, but also a currency ample in volume—one which can be diffused through the length and breadth of the land, to all sections—an inexpensive and elastic currency, which the people can everywhere have at a reasonable rate of interest with which to effect their daily exchanges and carry out their extraordinary undertakings. This is the only safe and sensible course to be pursued—the only one which will be sure to establish us upon a sound financial basis.

I am opposed to this measure, Mr. Speaker, for another reason. It is absolutely impossible to get the leading nations to agree to the free coinage of gold and silver at a fixed ratio. Is not our experience worth something to us upon this point? Four international conferences have assembled, and each one of them has terminated without doing anything toward promoting an international agreement. What has occurred recently to make us believe that there will be any change of sentiment upon the part of the other nations? On the contrary, all the leading commercial nations are now upon the existing gold standard, or, if not, they are anxiously striving to get there. Gentlemen say that certain legislative bodies abroad have recently declared in favor of an international conference; but, sir, is this anything more than occurred before some of the past conferences were held? The time was never more unpropitious for securing from other nations an agreement for the free coinage of the two metals at a fixed ratio than it is at the present time. I doubt not that a conference of the great commercial countries could be assembled. They would listen courteously to our proposals, discuss the economic questions involved, and then politely refuse to enter into any arrangement, and bid us good-bye, just as they have done on former occasions.

Certain gentlemen have risen on this floor and said that they had no faith in the success of this project, but that they were going to vote for it anyhow. I prefer, sir, to take the more logical position that this is a senseless proposal, without possibility of accomplishment, and therefore unworthy of my support. I propose to have the courage of my convictions and cast my vote against it. Mr. Speaker, how much longer shall we continue to temporize with this silver question? How much longer shall we continue to present to our countrymen and to the world the spectacle of our weakness, our vacillation, and our folly?

Why, sir, just at this time the great agitator who was the Democratic nominee for President in the last campaign, and who has renominated himself as the standard-bearer four years hence, is perambulating the country, rallying and organizing those who believe in a debased silver dollar for a renewal of the contest at the polls. Just at this very time the free-silver Republicans of the Senate and House, who walked out of the St. Louis convention to clasp hands with Populism and Democracy for a short-weight dollar, who went upon the stump and declared that the Republican party was irrevocably wedded to the gold standard, and that the bimetallism by international agreement, which it had suggested, was an absurdity and incapable of being attained, are issuing their address to the country, calling upon free-silver Republicans to organize in all the States and Territories of the Union to again do battle for a 50-cent dollar.

These advocates of remonetization of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 are making no apologies or concessions; they have nothing in common with you in this measure. They are perfectly willing to see you stumble, and are biding anxiously their opportunity for another onslaught upon public and private credit. What is our plain duty in such an hour as this?

We should clasp our hands firmly to our swords; we should adjust our helmets; we should tighten our cuirasses; we should step bravely and resolutely into the arena of conflict, prepared once more to put our principles to the test and to battle nobly and courageously to maintain them.

I protest, sir, that the verdict which you will render, if you pass this senseless bill, will be that William McKinley ought to have been defeated last November, and that William J. Bryan ought to be inaugurated President of the United States on the 4th day of next March. [Applause.] You were obliged to temporize and to compromise on this question by the act of 1878, and you suffered the consequences. You were compelled again to violate sound monetary principles by the passage of the act of 1890, and the great distress under which the country is laboring to-day is in a measure owing to the fatal economic mistake which you made when you passed that act.

Let us now and henceforth have a little more courage, a little more resolution, than was displayed in the past. Let us not vacillate; let us not hesitate any longer. We are eternally right on the subject of the gold standard. We have won the field. Why should we now abandon it? Why pass a bill which will be construed all over the country as an admission upon our part that after all Mr. Bryan and his economic falsehoods are in a large measure entitled to public consideration and respect; that he is at least halfway right?

Ah, but we are told, Mr. Speaker, that the Republican platform requires us to do this thing; and you will mark, sir, that no class of men have been so solicitous to have the Republican party carry out the alleged pledges of its platform as the Democrats who fought against us with desperation and attempted to defeat us at the polls. We have, too, the refreshing spectacle of Republican free silverites who abandoned their party to battle for their financial heresies—those gentlemen who went on the stump in the recent campaign and proclaimed that the gold standard was an outrage and a conspiracy and that the Republican party was wholly unworthy of public confidence—now, after they have been defeated, not only insisting that we shall fulfill the pledges of our platform but actually undertaking, as the gentleman from Montana has done, to tell us what definition of bimetallism we have created for the future. They are supplementing all this with an open threat and declaration that they are now organizing, and propose, when this measure fails in operation, to meet us at the polls at the biennial election and at the next Presidential election, and force upon us a repudiation of public and private credit, and the adoption of a dollar which should be everywhere repudiated by advancing civilization and the intelligence of the nineteenth century.

Mr. Speaker, I know not what others may do in this matter. Speaking my individual preference and my individual conviction I say to this House that I shall take no step backward, but that I shall vote against this proposition, because I believe that bimetallism is a sham and a fraud, and that the existing gold standard ought to be maintained for the benefit of the very people in whose name it is so adroitly assailed and for the additional reason that I believe that the nations of the Old World will regard this invitation to a conference just as they have regarded the invitations we have previously extended, with outward courtesy, but at the same time with secret contempt, and that no good can possibly come of a conference, even if it is assembled.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, we have only to witness the spectacle to which the House has been treated to-day to be confirmed in the contention of the Democratic party during the last campaign that the plank on the currency question that was inserted in the Republican platform was only placed there for the purpose of catching votes. The irreconcilable divisions that exist on the other side are sufficient to show that if this question were left to the Republican party there could be no bimetallism in this country.

The party criticised the Democratic Administration a few years ago, charging it with an "effort to demonetize silver." But in its last platform it pledged itself to maintain the gold standard till an international agreement could be had with foreign nations in favor of it. If the foreign nations never agree for us to move in that direction, we promise to stand still.

Does anyone think England will give her consent? Will she go for bimetallism? Is she not the "leading commercial nation" outside the United States, or, at least, one of the leading commercial nations? It is vain to expect it of her.

For one, and speaking, I think, the sentiments of the majority on this side, we propose to vote for this resolution, although we know, or believe, that it is destined to result in failure. But we do not propose to put any obstacle in the way of those who pretend to be in favor of bimetallism. For one, I stand where I have always stood on this question. I have ever believed—and I have voted as I believed—that it was the duty of the American people to establish a currency system for that people. I have believed, and yet believe, that it is within the power of the United States to make possible the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and I regret that we can not have that proposition put through here to-day instead of the one that is before us. I have voted for free coinage of silver every time it has been before Congress since I became a member.

I have always believed in free coinage. I believe that the people of the United States, who do 32 per cent of all the banking done in the world, 31 per cent of all the manufacturing that is done in the world, who have a majority of all the railroads that have been laid down in the world, whose agriculture and expenditures for education both surpass those of Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, and Italy combined, and who do a majority of the carrying trade of the world, can, if they will, maintain the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

I beg gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber to remember that beyond them and out of their reach, by their own act, the settlement of this question has been placed; they have no control now. Those Republicans who believe in free silver have tied their own hands. The incoming President has already selected as his Secretary of the Treasury one who had heretofore been a Democrat, but who departed from his party, who bolted its platform and abandoned its ticket because he did not believe in the free and unlimited coinage of silver. If quoted correctly, he does not favor silver.

You sent over to the other side, in a quiet, unofficial way, a distinguished and bright statesman, Mr. WOLCOTT, who has been wandering from court to court, and bowing at the feet of statesman after statesman there, pleading in vain for some little recognition of the rights of silver. The poor dove that day after day returned to the ark, weary-winged and leafless, was a no more sad spectacle than he when he returns to the Republican party now, announcing that he can accomplish nothing, and that in foreign climes he finds no dry land on which to settle his party's drifting and dilapidated ark.

Go on, gentlemen, with your work. Do yourselves no harm in your straitened and uncertain condition. The people of the United States are for free silver coinage, and the people of the United States will have free silver, despite your schemes. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has seventeen minutes remaining.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill and shall vote for it with pleasure. I deny the right of the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] to place a construction upon the last national Republican platform which this House shall accept. I deny his interpretation of the financial plank of that platform, which undertakes to commit the Republican party, now and forever, to gold monometallism. I deny his assertion, made upon the floor of this House, that that construction carried the last national election. I say to him now, and I say to the members of this House, that if that construction had been accepted by the people of this country, that grand representative of American manhood and the highest possibilities of American life, William McKinley, would not be inaugurated on the 4th day of next March President of this Republic.

The American people do not believe now, and I doubt if they will ever believe, in gold monometallism in the United States; but they do believe in gold as a standard of value, with as much silver in circulation as can be maintained on a parity with gold.

Neither are they in favor of absolute free silver. What we want is an international monetary conference that, if possible, will adjust this great and all-important question so as to meet, as far as possible, the demands of international commerce; and if we can not do it, let us try to make the nearest approach to it that it is possible to make.

I ask the Republican members of this House what we can say to the Republicans of the nation if we fail to keep the pledge made in the last Republican platform? I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that we agreed and bound ourselves in that platform to an international monetary conference, and unless we keep faith with the people of this Republic upon that subject, we can not escape their condemnation, and ought not to ask them again to indorse us at the polls. I hope this bill will pass. I have faith in the wisdom of the commission that will be appointed and in their judgment and loyalty on all questions that will affect this Republic. The people are looking forward to some legislation of this kind, and I trust this House will have the courage to pass this bill.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from New York will now use his time.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield eleven minutes, the balance of my time, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KNOX].

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, we are confronted here to-day with the spectacle of a bill presumably proposed by the Republican party, supported almost unanimously by the members of the Democratic and Populist parties upon this floor. I listened to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. He did not wish that the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] should construe the Republican platform for him. I say that I do not wish the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to construe the Republican platform for me. But I would far rather that he would do it than stand here and have the Democratic party and the Populist party construe the Republican platform for me. I have respect for those gentlemen and for their views. We met them fairly in open conflict; but I do not wish them to construe for me as a Republican the provisions of the platform under which we carried the country in November. Neither can I prevent distrusting their generous efforts to help us forward with this bill. I think they do it not in the interest of Republicanism, but in the interest of Populism, which has now got control of the Democratic party.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to enter upon any general discussion of the principles of bimetallism; but I have heard nothing said in this discussion to change my view that bimetallism in the sense of the concurrent circulation of two metals as money at an arbitrary ratio, with free coinage for both, is an impossibility. I do not believe that you can create and maintain the value of a commodity by law. I do not believe you can create and maintain the relative value of two commodities by law. The demand for a metal for coinage may affect its value, but only to a degree. Other important considerations will determine its market value.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think bimetallism and free coinage are a contradiction in terms; and that the only possible bimetallism is by preserving one as a standard and keeping the other as subsidiary. But I will not enter upon a discussion of this question; neither will I discuss any question of party policy or individual loyalty to party. I say they are not involved in this measure. I simply oppose the present bill at the present time. It is a bad bill. It is bad, in the first place, because it specifically provides that in whatever way a fixity of relative value of the two metals is to be brought about, it must be accompanied by free coinage. It does not leave it open to any conference that may be called for the purpose of securing international agreement to provide for an enlarged use of silver in any other way. The conference called, under the terms of this bill, when they meet, will find themselves bound hand and foot to the proposition that they must accompany whatever provision they may make with a provision for the free coinage of silver.

This bill is a bad bill, Mr. Speaker, because it does not prescribe any way or method by which free coinage is to be brought about, or by which fixity of relative value of the two metals is to be brought about. Is it not of considerable consequence that before we pass a bill of this importance the Congress of the United States should consider and determine in what way that is to be brought about? Should we not consider what propositions are to be submitted to this conference? Shall we go into this thing entirely in the dark? Ought not some proposition to be formulated? Why, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] said the other conferences failed because they had no authority. What authority has this conference? I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to tell us what this conference can do? They have nothing stated to them upon which they can act. This bill is a bad bill, and we are to have no opportunity for amendment. I refer to the way it is proposed to be put through under a suspension of the rules. An amendment was prepared which should contain the other provisions of the Republican platform, an amendment which says that—

> In thus authorizing the calling of an international conference, as described in section 1 of this act, the Government of the United States hereby declares "that it is unreservedly for sound money, that it is unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase the currency or to impair the credit of this country, that until such an agreement as this act contemplates can be obtained, the existing gold standard must be preserved and all our silver and paper money must be maintained at a parity with gold."

Mr. Speaker, is there a Republican who would have voted against that amendment? Is there a Democrat or a Populist who would have voted for it? And yet, sir, with this important measure before us, we, standing here and seeking an opportunity to support the Republican platform, are prevented from even offering an amendment, by gentlemen endeavoring to pass this bill under a suspension of the rules. This bill is a bad bill, as I have said, because it prescribes no method, while it declares for free silver. We do not know exactly what that declaration means, but we know one thing that it means. It means that silver is to be overvalued and that the overvaluation is to be maintained by the stamp of the Government. It means that a large part of the value of circulation is to be maintained by the fiat of the Government. That is Populism. That is the fundamental doctrine of Populism. Mr. Speaker, that is the doctrine that lies at the foundation of an irredeemable paper currency, and I say here, and I think the House will bear me out in the statement, that an irredeemable paper currency is what the Populists are after, and that if the nations of the earth can be brought to that ground, the real Populistic heaven will have been discovered.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What maintains the greenback at a parity with gold now?

Mr. KNOX. What maintains the greenback at a parity with gold? Not fiatism. The greenback is simply a promise to pay on demand. To pay what? To pay gold; and the Government of the United States is behind that promise. But when you stamp upon a piece of silver that it is worth more than it is worth and circulate it as money, that is fiatism; that is Populism; that is on the basis of an irredeemable currency.

Mr. TOWNE. Let me ask the gentleman what maintained the parity of the silver dollar between 1878 and 1890?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Before the pledge was made.

Mr. TOWNE. Yes; before the pledge was made which has been cited to-day as the cause of the parity.

Mr. KNOX. If I can make myself understood by the distinguished gentleman, I will answer him. My position upon bimetallism is that a certain amount of silver can be circulated as money, and that is true bimetallism. The parity was maintained because the amount of silver that was coined into dollars was limited, and because the coinage was made by the Government upon Government account, and was entirely controlled by the Government. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. TOWNE. I understand the gentleman, then, to concede the principle that the maintenance of the parity depends upon establishing a demand sufficient to employ the supply.

Mr. KNOX. Not at all.

Mr. TOWNE. Reconcile that with your other answer.

Mr. KNOX. The market value of the commodity, which is silver, will be maintained by the considerations which maintain the market value of any other commodity; but I say that none of the questions which the gentleman addresses to me apply to money when it is used as token money, when its amount is limited, and when the coinage is not free, but is simply made on Government account.

Mr. TOWNE. Does the gentleman contend that the silver dollar between 1878 and 1890 was token money?

Mr. KNOX. It was a legal tender.

Mr. TOWNE. It was standard money, was it not?

Mr. KNOX. For all purposes.

Mr. TOWNE. Why, then, do you speak of it as token money?

Mr. KNOX. I say it stands precisely upon the principle of token money as long as the amount of the coinage is limited and the coinage is done upon Government account.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman from Minnesota does not mean to suggest that the silver in the dollar does the buying, does he?

Mr. KNOX. No, he does not mean that.

Mr. TOWNE. I mean to suggest that——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNE. I would like time to tell you what I mean. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Maine, Mr. DINGLEY. [Applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the six minutes which have been allotted to me I can only briefly suggest two reasons why I shall support the pending bill. First, it is in response to the clear, distinct, unequivocal pledge of the Republican party in the last campaign. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, sometimes resolutions are adopted in national conventions hastily and inconsiderately that have no binding force, but everyone who is acquainted with the circumstances under which the St. Louis convention was held understands that this feature of the platform was a clear, distinct, and well-considered declaration of the Republican party. [Applause.]

The Republican party at St. Louis declared against the free coinage of silver by the independent action of this country, because they believed, as I believe, and as every scientific bimetallist in the world outside of politics believes, that such independent free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, would be nothing in the world but silver monometallism and a silver standard. But the party said at the same time that they would promote, so far as in their power, an international agreement for the free coinage of silver under conditions which should make every dollar in silver as good as every dollar in gold; and that pledge it is our duty to-day by the passage of this bill to endeavor to redeem. [Applause.]

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the passage of this bill because I believe that its defeat under the circumstances under which it is presented, and in view of the pledge which we made at the St. Louis convention, would result in a great injury to the sound-money cause. [Applause.] It must be understood that there are in this country thousands—yes, millions—of voters who, while opposed to the free coinage of silver by this country alone, because they believe that would give us simply silver monometallism, as I believe it would, are yet in favor of an honest effort to secure an international agreement upon this point, because they believe that if that can be secured through the cooperation of the great commercial nations of the world it would give us a currency every dollar of which would be as good as gold, and that we should thus have a gold standard or its equivalent. That is what they believe.

Now, in view of the fact that there are these millions of people who believe that this can be accomplished, I hold, without entering upon any discussion as to the probabilities of success, that it would be a great mistake for this side of the House under those conditions not to meet the wishes of those men and make an earnest endeavor to obtain such an international agreement. It it fails, then we shall have done our full duty in the premises and no harm will have happened. If it succeeds, then we shall have secured throughout the commercial world a universal common standard of value that will promote international trade. [Applause.] I believe, therefore, under these circumstances, without entering upon the discussion of the various questions involved, that it is the duty of every Republican, in view of the pledge that we made, in view of the fact that we should damage the cause of sound money by refusing to meet our pledge, to vote for the pending bill.

The suggestion that this is not the time to act is purely technical. The bill is here before us; and we must meet it one way or another. We as Republicans or we as sound-money men can not go to the country and say that if this measure had been presented to us two months hence, we would favor it; but now we are opposed to it. We can not dodge in any such way. [Applause.]

One word further. When the suggestion is made that gentlemen in favor of the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 by this country alone are voting for this bill, I want you to read between the lines of speeches condemnatory of this bill which have been made here and elsewhere and you can infer that nothing would please some of them so much as to see this bill defeated to-day; and if their votes would do it without shouldering the responsibility for such action, I fear they would be so cast.

Mr. TOWNE. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. DINGLEY. I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has expired.

Mr. TOWNE. I desire simply to say——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. TOWNE. I think I am entitled to rise to a question of personal privilege. The concluding remarks of the gentleman from Maine referred to those who believe in the free coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1, of whom I am known to be one——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. TOWNE. The gentleman chooses to impute to us a sinister motive in voting for this bill——

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman does not present any question of privilege at all.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, important declarations in political platforms are never the result of accident, but are always the result of design. They are always born of conditions existing in the constituents of the party that gives the utterance. The Republican convention at St. Louis was a representative body of a great party in the country, and the men who went there and represented their several constituencies understood the conditions at home. They did not go to St. Louis to declare a platitude nor to make a mere declaration that was not demanded by existing conditions and that was not in consonance with the opinions of their constituents. The Republican party at the threshold of the campaign was met by the question of what should constitute its financial plank, and looking to what the party had done and what it had already pledged itself to do, it found that it had put into the statute book of the United States the declaration that the country pledged itself to the maintenance of the parity between gold and silver on November 1, 1893, when a Republican Congress, by the almost solid vote of its party in both Houses, repealed the Sherman purchasing clause and enacted the following:

> That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value.

That was the law of the United States of America when the St. Louis convention assembled and the platform was adopted, and yet the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] comes here and tells us that the Republican party is under no obligations in regard to the parity of this coinage, but is a single gold standard party. The compromises of the St. Louis convention produced the result that we have before us, and I want to read a single paragraph from the proceedings of that convention, which will show what the understanding of the representatives there present was when this plank was brought in.

I will say, first, that that was a memorable occasion, one that no man who witnessed it will ever misunderstand. It was an occasion that will be a warning to a great many men in this country that they must obey party dictation and follow party standards, or cease to be members of that political party.

Mr. QUIGG. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I mean exactly what I say.

Mr. KNOX. Does the gentleman mean to read anybody out of the party?

Mr. QUIGG. I want to say that I will not accept the voice from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, the gentleman will follow his party. He is a good Republican. He is just out on a mistaken notion——

Mr. QUIGG. I will follow the voice of my constituents right along.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am going to talk with you about your constituents in a moment. [Laughter.]

I read from the official report of the proceedings of the St. Louis convention. I will give the language that was sent out to a listening world, borne upon the magnificent voice of a most distinguished Ohioan, now Senator Foraker, who is soon to take his seat at the other end of the Capitol, pledged to stand by this platform, giving force and effect to all its language and all its promises. No one who was present in that convention will ever forget the splendid delivery of that platform and the magnificent reception which it received:

The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money. [Great applause.] It caused the enactment of a law providing for the redemption of specie payments in 1879. Since then every dollar has been as good as gold. [Applause.] We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our country. [Applause.] We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver, except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the earth—— which agreement we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be maintained. All of our silver and paper currency must be maintained at parity with gold, and we favor all measures designated to maintain inviolable the obligations of the United States, of all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

There was a scene never to be forgotten. Days had been spent in considering the platform, efforts had been made to compel candidates for President to more specifically announce their particular views upon this particular question, and finally the convention was brought face to face with the work of its committee, which had been carefully studied, fully deliberated upon, and finally brought forward for the action of the convention.

Now there came an issue, a crisis in that convention, when every representative of every constituency had an opportunity to declare whether he was satisfied or not satisfied with that declaration. A call of the States was demanded, and under the representative rules of a Republican convention every Republican representative had a right to stand up and record his vote for or against that platform, or that single section of the platform, voted upon as a separate and distinct proposition. They did not rush the platform through as a whole, but upon the demand for a vote upon the single resolution the States were called, and I am going to read the votes of four States on that occasion. That was the time to have protested. That was the time to say that it was a humbug. That was the time to deny the leadership of the committee on resolutions. When the State of Indiana was called, there were 30 votes, of thirty great Republicans, representing that great constituency, and all thirty of them voted "aye." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Inasmuch as the gentleman has referred to Indiana, he will permit me to remark that I never made an argument in the last campaign against free silver and its heresies that I did not necessarily strike bimetallism squarely in the face.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well, then, the gentleman struck his party in the face.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Not at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, we come down to the great State of Massachusetts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I wish to say to the gentleman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the gentleman from Indiana has had time in his own right and has talked a good deal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman from Ohio ought not to reproach anybody for talking a good deal.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, "the gentleman from Ohio" does not talk as fast as the gentleman from Indiana, and does not talk as sweetly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. He talks a good deal oftener.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And his voice is not as musical to himself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Nor to anybody else.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now we come to Massachusetts. Massachusetts was represented in that convention by her great leaders, men who understood the wishes of their constituency. One of them, the distinguished Senator, Mr. LODGE, had had much to do with the framing of the platform, and it is claimed for him, and I have never heard it disputed, that it was his pen that drafted the language of this financial plank. Massachusetts cast 30 votes, all solidly "aye." Then we come to the great Empire State. Among her leading men was the Hon. Thomas C. Platt, soon to become a Senator from the Empire State, and the whole 72 of them voted "aye." So did Pennsylvania, and so did 812 out of 924 representatives. Among the "ayes," among the States that cast their vote solidly and without protest for that plank of that platform, with its interpretation fully known and fully understood, was the grand old New England State of Connecticut, then represented by a delegation intelligent, patriotic, and wise.

I will at this point, Mr. Speaker, reproduce the table showing the "ayes" and "noes" upon the financial plank. It will be seen that of the 110½ votes cast against the plank, practically all of them came from States that afterwards cast their vote for Mr. Bryan:

*One absent.

Mr. HARDY. And the gentleman from New York was a delegate to that convention?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes, I was, and voted for the platform and shall construe it in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not need any construction. We did not need any construction of it during the campaign.

I was saying that more than 100 men who will ornament the next House of Representatives on the Republican side owe their election to that platform and an honest espousal of it before the masses of the people. [Applause.]

Now, what have we here? The Republican party on this floor is called upon to act to-day. This bill is here for action, not repudiation. This bill came from the gathered wisdom of its friends at the other end of the Capitol; it came in obedience to the voice of the Republican party. True, a great many men got on board of the Republican ship during last summer. Are we to turn from our own proposition because Democrats voted with us? Quite the reverse. When we saw them drowning in the water, we gathered them up and took them ashore, and we have planted them on the rock of honest money and good government, and the Republican party owes nothing more to the men who have joined it for principle. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent to put certain of the paragraphs that I imperfectly read into my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill as amended.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 281, noes 4, not voting 70; as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanying the annual reports of the consuls of the United States upon foreign industries and commerce. In view of the value of these reports to the business interests throughout the country, I indorse the recommendation of the Secretary of State that Congress authorize the printing of a special edition of 10,000 copies of the general summary entitled, "Review of the World's Commerce," and of 5,000 copies of "Commercial Relations" (including this summary), to enable the Department of State to meet the demand for such information.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7469) for the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalks, cross walks, and gutters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "to," in line 8 of section 1, insert the word "be;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

G. M. CURTIS,
AD. MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

JAMES McMILLAN,
CHAS. J. FAULKNER,
LUCIEN BAKER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the conferees on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The Senate amended the House bill by inserting the word "agent" for the word "owner" wherever it occurred. The House accepted the amendments of the Senate, but a clerical error having been made in the official copy of the print of the bill, the bill was sent to conference, and the clerical error has been corrected by the insertion of the word "be" in line 8, so that the phrase shall read "cause the same to be removed."

The conference report was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 7320) to prevent trespassing upon and providing for the protection of national military parks, asked a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. WALTHALL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

TARIFF HEARINGS.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report, which I send to the desk.

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress 15,000 copies of the tariff hearings of the Committee on Ways and Means during the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 copies for the use of the House.

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration House concurrent resolution No. 70, for the printing of 15,000 copies of the tariff hearings of the Committee on Ways and Means during the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, recommend that the same be agreed to, with amendments, as follows:

Strike out, in line 3, the word "fifteen" and insert "ten."

In lines 5 and 6 strike out "5,000" and insert "3,250."

In lines 6 and 7 strike out "10,000" and insert "6,750;" so that it shall read: "That there be printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress 10,000 copies of the tariff hearings of the Committee on Ways and Means during the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, of which 3,250 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 6,750 copies for the use of the House."

These hearings will occupy two volumes, and the Public Printer estimates the cost of the work under this resolution as amended at $10,666.

The amendments were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

FOREIGN DECORATIONS FOR AMERICANS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have bills and resolutions, four in number, relating to allowing certain distinguished Americans to accept decorations. They have passed the Senate and are reported favorably in the House, and I should like to have them disposed of at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

PROFS. SIMON NEWCOMB AND ASAPH HALL.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, and Prof. Asaph Hall, United States Navy, be, and they are hereby, authorized to accept from the Government of the Republic of France the decorations awarded to them, respectively, for their services to the French Academy of Sciences as corresponding members.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Rear-Admiral W. A. Kirkland, United States Navy, be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept a gold box presented to him by the Emperor of Germany.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M'CARTY LITTLE.

The next business was the resolution (S. R. 76) authorizing Lieut. William McCarty Little to accept a decoration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Lieut. William McCarty Little, of the United States Navy, be, and is hereby, authorized to accept from the King of Spain, through the Queen Regent, the decoration of the cross of ordinary commander of the Order of Isabella the Catholic in recognition of his services in Spain in connection with the Columbian Exposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the services referred to in the resolution were. In view of certain relations that we all perfectly understand, I doubt the propriety of passing this resolution, and I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

HERBERT H. D. PEIRCE.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Herbert H. D. Peirce, secretary of legation at St. Petersburg, be, and he hereby is, authorized to accept a medal conferred upon him by the Imperial Russian Government in recognition of his services at the time of the coronation of the Czar.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The decoration in this case, as I understand, is a very small matter—a gold snuffbox or something of that kind. I do not know the details, as the resolutions do not come from my committee.

Mr. BAILEY. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, it is almost inexplicable that an American would want a decoration from any foreign government.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, these are not strictly decorations. They do not carry titles or anything of that kind.

Mr. BAILEY. I know; but some of these are cases of accepting decorations.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is a custom to recognize the services of distinguished officers in connection with these international expositions.

Mr. BAILEY. This, I understand, is a proposition to recognize services rendered in the coronation of the Czar of Russia, and to that I object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me a remark?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. HITT. This medal is a form of international courtesy which has been extended by the Russian Government to many other governments; and to refuse it, or to authorize or necessitate its refusal, would be simple churlishness, because every other nation has accepted it. A refusal would be just like refusing an answer to a polite salute.

Mr. BAILEY. I decline to allow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] to characterize my conduct as "churlish."

Mr. HITT. I did not impute any such thing to the gentleman. I spoke of the character of the act as it would be construed by people who are accustomed to the international usages. This matter is wholly unimportant and trivial to us in our view. But in the intercourse of nations these acts are so ordinary that they only attract attention when the customary compliance with usage is refused.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Illinois persuades me to yield; and while I think this is a very small thing for an American to want, still I will not raise any objection.

I am told that the proposition to accept something from the Government of Spain grows out of our Columbian Exposition, and while I do not know that this is a time for an American to be accepting decorations from Spain, yet in view of the fact that this relates to our own exposition I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This refers to an incident which occurred many years ago.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was read three times, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 25, 1897:

An act (H. R. 1095) granting a pension to Annie M. Ermer;

An act (H. R. 4548) granting a pension to Mary L. Arnold;

An act (H. R. 4655) granting a pension to Frederick A. Driscol;

An act (H. R. 446) to increase the pension of Julia H. H. Crosby;

An act (H. R. 8898) to increase the pension of Elizabeth Wellons;

An act (H. R. 7131) to restore Mrs. Elizabeth T. Anderson to the pension roll;

An act (H. R. 8037) for the relief of John McLain, alias Michael McLain;

An act (H. R. 3926) to correct the war record of David Sample;

An act (H. R. 9168) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Monongahela River from the city of McKeesport to the township of Mifflin, Allegheny County, Pa.;

An act (H. R. 5490) to license billiard and pool tables in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. 6834) to prevent the purchasing of or speculating in claims against the Federal Government by United States officers.

The following bills were presented to the President on the 13th of February, 1897, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, they have become laws without his approval:

An act (H. R. 1498) directing the Secretary of War to grant an honorable discharge to William M. Dalzell; and

An act (H. R. 1323) for the relief of Ira H. Sweatt.

WILLIAM M'CARTY LITTLE.

The SPEAKER. Objection is withdrawn to the consideration of the resolution, which will be read.

The Clerk again read the joint resolution (S. R. 76) authorizing Lieut. William McCarty Little to accept a decoration from the King of Spain.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was read three times, and passed.

DECORATIONS FROM HAWAIIAN GOVERNMENT.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 150) authorizing the persons herein named to accept certain decorations and testimonials from the late Hawaiian Government.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Rear-Admiral George Brown, United States Navy, be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept a decoration of a Knight Grand Officer of the Royal Order of Kalakaua, conferred upon him by the King of the Hawaiian Islands on December 5, 1890, in recognition of his services to the King upon the occasion of his visit to California;

That Ensign George P. Blow, United States Navy, be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept a decoration of the Royal Order of Kalakaua, conferred upon him by the Queen of the Hawaiian Islands in recognition of his services to the late King;
